A final word on the prevailing types of phonographs used. The novice naturally thinks of the disc phonograph as the highest type. While it has its merits it has also its faults. The fine disc machine gives a mellower, more human tone-quality than the cylinder phonograph, but the steady scratch of its needle is harsh and it is weak on clarity of enunciation. In sustained tones, such as band or singing records (not comic) this is not a serious fault, but for talking records it is painfully evident. Again, the loudest disc phonograph has not the volume or carrying power of the loudest cylinder machine. In fact, the sound from a disc machine cannot, save in a very small hall, be projected successfully through the sheet and thus seem to issue from the very mouths of the characters, but must be placed at one side, leaving the horn open and unobstructed.

This mention of the sheet brings up another serious difficulty. All experienced moving picture men know that the most brilliant pictures are obtained by projecting upon a smooth, white, opaque surface, such as a plaster wall. For talking pictures we must use muslin sheeting through which the sound can pass. The thinner the sheet, the better the results—as to sound. But not as to the picture. The result here is a dingy gray picture, lacking brilliancy and contrast.

And while on the subject of the picture we must consider another great obstacle. In talking pictures the subjects usually partake of the nature of a theater act or performance, involving particular scenes and having the performers in costumes. It seems natural, therefore, that some promoters of these pictures should equip their stdios for staging and photographing their pictures entirely by artificial light, indoors.

Those familiar with the best film-making methods will appreciate this error, for whenever it is by any means possible all motion photography should be done in daylight. Glass roof studios would have served this purpose.

As to choice of subjects there is much to be considered. The obviously easy way is too apt to be thought the most expedient, a fact which has led to the tiresome prevalence of the song acts already alluded to.

A song and dance, or vaudeville "turn," is the type most commonly used. A knockout comedy "act" is frequently resorted to, but when it is in dialect it usually proves a failure; all dialects, especially the German (which is so funny on the actual stage) proving unintelligible when rendered by phonograph.

As to that most successful type of production in silent film, the "story picture," little has been done, yet it is probably the most desirable of all for this purpose.

There are scores of standard plays, celebrated wherever the English tongue is spoken, which offer great possibilities. One great advantage is the fact that they would possess interest after several years elapse, while the topical song of the day is stale and unprofitable as soon as it becomes a "chestnut." To those who realize the heavy expense of staging and producing pictures this should be evident. A photographic film negative should be good for as long a time as possible.

This naturally leads us to a consideration of the business side of a talking picture enterprise, which involves a serious review of the rental business as it affects this branch.

Talking pictures must have a limited field of operation, because they must cost the exhibitor considerably more than silent film service. Instead of a rental figured on a purchase price of ten or eleven cents per foot the lowest price must run from fifteen to twenty cents. And vice versa, a limited field of use makes necessary a higher price. A specially trained operator is also necessary, at a conseqently higher salary, and an additional salary is required for a phonograph or "record" attendant behind the sheet. Where the exhibitor pays thirty to sixty dollars a week for silent film service and employs one operator, he must pay sixty to one hundred dollars a week for "talking" films and records and double his salary item to operators. For the same length of programme the cost is therefore double to the exhibitor. This precludes the use of such service in small "store" shows and furthermore causes the exhibitor taking it to demand exclusive rights, even in a fairly large city. Thus it is doubtful if cities of less than seventy-five thousand population can regularly operate such service, and in all cities of less than two hundred thousand not more than one subscriber to such service can be obtained.

One can therefore see how restricted is the available field. If we compare it with that of the good silent film we see great differences. When Pathe, Edison, Vitagraph, or Biograph produce a negative they print from it seventy-five to several hundred positive prints, sell them to renters, turn their capital and profits at once and go ahead. If a company manufacturing talking picture film produces a negative it must print as few positives as possible. Shipped for one week's use a reel works one week out of four during its lifetime, the other three being spent in transit, overhauling at the home office, etc. It must be remembered that very little renting of talking pictures has been developed so far by recognized film exchanges, so that each week's return is made to the factory and each shipment made therefrom. Incidentally, this involves a heavy cost in expressage. The repairs and replacements are likewise a much heavier expense than with silent films, for while a few feet torn by accident from a silent film is of small importance, the same quantity removed from a "talking picture" film must be promptly replaced, or the subject is useless. The rentable life of a reel, therefore, is considerably shorter than with "silent" film.

A condition is now unfolded which is food for serious thought to all persons in the manufacturing and renting of film. Since professional show operation requires constant changes of subjects, and steady production of new material at the studio, and some form of exclusive protection, the service must necessarily be limited. It is a grave question, therefore, how the manufacturer shall get his money out of the film he produces, especially if he has made his own photograph records for these films.

He must do two things:

First. Produce only such subjects as will command general human interest both now and a year from now.

Second. Widen, by every means in his power, his field of use, extending it as soon as possible outside professional show operation.

I have heard it reliably stated toward the close of last year, that many film renters were making little money, being compelled to buy too rapidly the new film necessary to meet the demands for frequent changes of programme by their exhibitors. In other words, the quick renting market or demand was exhausted more rapidly than the supply of necessary new material came in. As a result hundreds of reels in usable condition lay on shelves practically dead. And it appears to me that there is only one solution to this problem. If the professional show field is not wide enough to enable a renter to get the full life's work out of a film, he must develop new business in his territory outside the professional show field. Many live exchanges have perceived this, of course, and have done as much work for churches, clubs, lodges, Y. M. C. A. branches, schools, etc., as they could get. Here they show films which are dead in their territory so far as professional show use is concerned.

But that is not enough. The manufacturers must recognize this condition also, and apply the only remedy, by advertising to reach these other fields of entertainment, and by producing as large a proportion as possible of subjects that have educational value; that will appeal to refined or fastidious audiences, in other words.

Applied to the talking picture industry, this condition is of enormous significance. I do not believe that any maker of talking pictures on a large scale can declare a dividend until he develops these other fields of exhibition. None has, so far. And a hundred unique uses of such pictures await the firm or company that develops that field. Political addresses, religious teaching, classic drama, the teaching of physical culture and massage, the staging of dramas to teach public lessons in campaigns for reform and health measures, are a few of the many.

But it requires a rare combination of ability and taste to direct such uses of the device; and some new ideas as to the phonograph must be applied.

Briefly summarized, a phonograph-talking picture enterprise, to succeed, must—

Make good films, taken by daylight.

Avoid stock records.

Select standard subjects, and properly dramatize and produce them.

Use China silk sheets (thin, yet brilliant in reflecting power).

Use a device to lessen or increase the volume of its phonographs.

And having done these things it will have some of the physical means of an entertainment, but the entertainment is yet to be given, which requires a skilfulness of management undreamed of in silent picture shows; for a talking picture entertainment is not an automatic or mechanical proposition; it is a show or theatrical proposition, and nothing can make it otherwise. This is the most important point in the discussion, by far.

There is a theatrical principle which underlies all entertainments not purely mechanical, and therefore enjoyed as a curiosity or freak. It is this: A show is just as big as you make it appear! Exhibit talking pictures merely as a novel freak, a curiosity, and they may draw good houses until the novelty wears off. Then you are through and must abandon them.

Adroit stage management, however, can make a lasting feature of them, as a part of an entertainment. Realize at the outset that you are not dealing with a mere film entertainment, but a theatrical show. The sound portion of the show, if good, will help, if not good, will detract from, the effectiveness of the performance. Apart from the important fact that an exclusively "picture" entertainment will not hold the attention of an audience for more than twenty minutes, we have this to consider: A gorgeous stage spectacle must have thoroughly pleasing music. The most beautiful of stage settings in a first-class theatrical production, accompanied by a crude, clumsy street band, would be laughed off the stage. And the phonograph alone as a sound accompaniment to film is not enough. Many of the most desirable sound-effects are impossible with it. Show a picture of a fight, with pistols discharged, for instance, and you find that a pistol shot is an impossible effect on the phonograph. With even a song-and-dance act the realism is lacking, because the tapping of the dancer's feet on the floor is missing. With phonograph sound-pictures you must also have your trap-drummer and all the "sound props" or effects produced by the operator behind the sheet. Each act must be presented as completely stage-managed as if it were a human stage performance. The very titles—printed on the films—are a drawback. Instead of a brief, perfunctory, crude title on the film the stereopticon should be used. All titles and introductory announcements of acts can then be shown in an impressive manner, calculated to arouse interested anticipation in the audience, using as many artistic slides as you wish. The performance should be broken up as much as possible by human performers, a picture singer, monologist, lecturer, ventriloquist or other artist being introduced. All this involves work and expense.

There is no doubt that the phonograph sound-picture has many advantages over two men and a woman behind the sheet, improvising "lines." It can render choruses, shouts of crowds, orchestral effects, etc., but it is only good as part of a performance. The other factors are equally necessary, and colored films will eventually be indispensable.

As to specially posed talking film used with human speakers, it has barely begun, but there is little doubt that, some day, the finest effects of human illusion will be so obtained. Limited to acts in which few voices are involved, the most artistic results will be so made. But the exact lines of the scene must be spoken and by really able speakers, with all the sound effects obtainable.

In conclusion, I would say that I have faith in the future of sound-motion pictures, but not as they are being manufactured or exhibited at present. It is natural to the introductory stages of an art that obstacles should render progress difficult and slow. Let us not be like those who now look back to the days when they declared the telephone merely a scientific toy, having no real future, commercially.

My purpose in this brief article is not to deter those who would use "talking pictures" or who would strive to develop them as an industry. My motive is to save such persons time and money by stating frankly the result of my experience and observation. We must look the facts in the face.

CARL HERBERT.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

The clerical antagonists of the moving picture were in force at the City Hall, New York City, on Friday, March 12, when a committee of the Aldermen sat to hear public criticism of the Mayor's proposal to impose an annual license of $250 on moving picture theaters and close them on Sundays. The room was well filled by exhibitors, clergymen, religious ladies and others interested. Canon Chase was amongst the speakers, who included many other earnest Sabbatarians. I sat with the reporters. We said nothing, but thought (and wrote) a lot. We wrote differently, but thought a lot, and we all thought alike.

The arguments against the Sunday opening of moving picture shows, as put out by the reverend opponents, amount to these: (1) They violate the Commandments. (2) They are illegal. (3) They are contrary to Aldermanic ordinance. These arguments are easily rebutted: (1) There is no universally recognized interpretation of the Ten Commandments in existence. (2) If the opening of moving picture theaters is illegal the law can close them. (3) So can the Aldermen. Justice, however, demands that if the moving picture show is to be closed the street car must stop; the concert be forbidden; the news stand swept away; the restaurant put in darkness; the dancing saloon silenced; the Subway emptied; and so on, until New York on Sundays is made to look like a city of the dead. All this is the logical outcome of last week's agitation.

The Sabbatarians urged that if the moving picture shows were closed the street-walkers and other evildoers would find their occupation gone. Rubbish. Also "immoral acts" in moving picture shows would be prevented! Nothing to prevent them taking place in church. Not far from where I live there are two noted churches. Outside them on Sunday evenings, whilst service is in progress, there is always a fine assortment of gaily decked Delilahs plying for hire. They don't find their most remunerative patrons amongst the audiences of 5 and 10 cent picture shows. I am sorry to have to resort to this severe form of tu quoque argument, but really when it comes to a matter of stigmatising the moving picture show as a nucleus of immorality I think these reverend agitators should look a little nearer home for mischief.

To my mind the most serious charge brought against the moving picture theater is that it prevents a child from getting the necessary religious instruction on Sunday. But does it, or need it? Of course not. Morning church and Sunday school are usually over before the moving picture theaters open. This objection, then, is untenable. Canon Chase and his friends show stereopticon views in their churches on Sundays. According to them, the same kind of picture shown in motion in a nickelodeon is sinful. Rather one-sided reasoning, is it not? Frankly, at the City Hall meeting the case made out against the Sunday opening of the moving picture theater struck me as weak and fanatical to a degree, and unworthy of broad-minded, tolerant ministers such as Americans are usually supposed to be.

The outcome of the Aldermanic committee's deliberations remains to be seen. I do not think it matters much at present one way or the other. Ultimately the moving picture show on Sundays will be just as much a recognized institution as Canon Chase's Williamsburg sermons on Sundays; or the illustrated newspaper; or the art gallery; or the beauties of Central Park; or the majesty of the sea and sky at Coney Island. All these, properly regarded, make for good. If they are good six days a week they cannot be bad on Sundays. Puritan times have gone, never to return. The people demand wholesome recreation on the Sunday and they will have it. Take away the moving picture and they will find a substitute, possibly not so innocuous as a photograph on a screen.

Needless to say I am not defending bad moving picture shows. Nobody does; nobody wants to. But do, please, Canon Chase, be fair, be impartial, be logical, and if you shut up the moving picture theater shut up ALL Sunday trading. Stop people going to Fort George or Coney; stop the steamer going to the Liberty statue; the ferries from taking me to Staten Island; close all traffic (including the automobiles of the rich); shut every public place but the church, and then you will have demonstrated your consistency as well as your sincerity. At present the poor man and the poor child only are the objects of Sabbatarian persecution; the rich are unkindly neglected; so does it not all look as if these reforming persons are partial and uncharitable in their methods? A rich man's child has a soul to save as well as the child of a poor man. Why not shut up the Plaza, the Bronx Zoological Park, and raze the Fifth avenue mansions to the ground? Are all these guiltless of the possibilities of evil, Canon? I pause for a reply.

Among the Exhibitors.

By Our Special Correspondent.

In reference to the rumor circulating in Chester, Pa., that the two playhouses are ready to wage war on the moving picture shows, if they persist in showing vaudeville, we find that other places have also entered into the same warlike spirit.

Trenton, N. J., comes up with a motion to enforce the law that shows licensed at $50 shall exhibit moving pictures only and if they insist in showing vaudeville, to be taxed to the full theatrical license of $150.

Wilmington, Del., gives us another example of the bitter fight between moving pictures and theater men, as the Opera House is showing five full reels as a show.

How can a 5-cent house exhibit 5 reels? Five reels constitute a 2-hour show, so from 7 to 11 P. M. the houses would have only 2 shows, and as most of them do not seat over 300 persons, their receipts would be under $30 per night; and with such meagre receipts they would not be in a position to pay for the films and their other expenses.

As long as the 5-cent shows were giving a song or a single, mediocre vaudeville act, the theaters did not kick, but when the moving picture exhibitors show vaudeville including an act with 7 performers, the theaters see the danger and are now fighting the moving picture men to a finish.

The Savoy, of Wilmington, is doing the best business and this fact is acknowledged by the other exhibitors, as one of them told me: "When we are sitting in disgust waiting for the matinee trade, the Savoy is doing a rushing business." The Savoy does not show vaudeville, had not even music while I was there, but they have the reputation of showing the best pictures.

This proves once more that good pictures can be shown without the help of vaudeville; brass bands, free souvenirs, piano or discordant phonograph. Only pictures, but of the best quality.

The Motion Picture Patents Company and the Independents should protect the industry by refusing to rent films to places showing tawdry vaudeville.

I went to spend the evening in Camden and found all the houses doing fairly good business, with the New Majestic crowded to the doors.

Evidently I was tempted to see the "new $102 place," called the Gaiety. It was a real bargain, as the stage and neatly framed screen must have cost a good deal more money. The lucky owner, who seems to believe in bargains, must have hired a "bargain operator," dispensing the films as quickly as the goods are sold on a bargain counter. He ran his machine at such a speed that the remarkable action of the great film, "Sherlock Holmes II.," was destroyed and the audience had no time to read the two short notes shown on the screen. A barker at the door was alluring the promenaders with a promise of 7 new pictures. Yes, 7; but some were good rain storm specimens and some of them very short.

The Lyric, perhaps the oldest house in Camden, said they have no vaudeville and never contemplated having any, as they would have to sacrifice the quality of the pictures to pay the cost of the vaudeville acts.

The Royal was of the same opinion and told me they had no idea of putting on vaudeville.

The Do Drop In, a very original name for a moving picture theater, was doing a good business, as the show was for the benefit of a baseball team, and many enthusiasts were selling tickets on the streets.

Before leaving Philadelphia I had a chance to hear Mr. Lubin's new invention of "talking pictures." The effect was very good and the synchronizing was perfect. With such an invention it will be easy to have vaudeville in moving pictures without stepping on the ground of the theatrical managers.

Philadelphia is not without its troubles, as the police are trying to enforce an ordinance by which no spectators are to be allowed to stand in the aisles or behind the railings. The ordinance, although a very good precaution in many cases, is somewhat arbitrary on certain exhibitors, who provided numerous wide exit doors and who do not allow any one in the aisles, but have provided some standing room between the railings and entrance doors, to keep the spectators out of the bad weather while waiting a chance for a seat. The Director of Public Safety does not seem to make any difference between a new, modern, well constructed moving picture palace and an old, narrow store converted into a small theater.

A Commotion in Trenton, N. J.

Is the new management of the State Theater trying to monopolize the moving picture business of the place, or trying to kill the other shows as a punishment for having adopted vaudeville in their respective places?

There is no doubt that the other shows on Broad and State streets will suffer from the severe competition and that the money they are now spending in improvements will not save them from the failure in store for them.

The programme of the State Theater comprises 6 important and expensive vaudeville acts, some of them with 4 and 5 performers, and three reels of pictures. The admission is 5 and 10 cents. No 5-cent moving picture house can afford to give even half of such a programme. If the vaudeville acts of the State Theater are of a high class, the pictures are old, rain storms, scratched, titles missing, etc., and shown by a very poor operator who does not seem to be able to control his carbons and his machine. The pictures were poorly lighted, unsteady on the screen and painful to the eye. Are we to believe that the public does not care so much for the quality as they do for the quantity?

The Dreamland is building a new place. The Royal is remodeling and the Star has made many improvements, including a new stage. All this for what? To meet the competition of some unscrupulous showmen who by showing vaudeville are giving too much for the admission fee.

Is it not time that the exhibitors make peace with the theaters by throwing overboard vaudeville, "the worst enemy of cinematography," to use the appropriate words of the Do Drop In Theater of Camden?

The answers generally received from most of the exhibitors are: "The public demands vaudeville." Mistake. The public never demanded vaudeville acts with moving pictures, but the public is always ready to take all that you are willing to give for the admission fee. The public is just. It does not demand of Hammerstein grand opera with Caruso for 5 cents, but if an exhibitor wishes to give genuine grand opera sandwiched between two moving pictures the public is not going to boycott such a showman but will gladly accept his generosity.

The movement has been started by a number of unscrupulous exhibitors, anxious to take the business away from their competitors, and now the theatrical managers are in revolt and there is no doubt that they will have the upper hand, unless the moving picture interests decide to make peace by giving up what is the property of the stage.

For the sake of our Trenton friends, I sincerely hope that my prophecy of failure will not be fulfilled and that they will take the bull by the horns before it is too late.

My next letter will tell you what our friends, the Pennsylvania Dutch, are doing. Allentown, Reading and the like will perhaps make some innovation by replacing vaudeville with refreshments and by throwing in a bag of peanuts.

The general cry is that everything is going up, flour, metal, shoes, clothing, rent, etc. Now as the necessities of life go up in prices, the pleasures are coming down. Who would have dreamed, five years ago, that we could see 6 high class vaudeville acts with 3 reels of moving pictures for 5 cents?

JNO. M. BRADLET.

Rochester, N. Y.—The National Theater in this city, under the management of Hurtig & Seamon, which formerly presented legitimate plays, has changed its policy to vaudeville and moving pictures. An exhibition of films of Independent manufacture was given there on Friday of last week.

WEEKLY COMMENTS ON THE SHOWS.

By Our Own Critic.

I found an honest man in charge of Nicoland, at Third avenue and 161st street, New York, on Thursday last, when, being in an absent-minded mood, I laid down a dime before the lady in the box office. My mistake was discovered to me by an attendant, who, when I had taken my seat in the hall, came and kindly returned me a nickel. So I will always have a soft spot in my heart for the honest people of Nicoland.

The principal object of this visit was to judge of the influence of the screen on the picture. The former is the "Solar Screen," supplied by A. L. Simpson, [illegible] West 132d street, New York. I don't know the exact [illegible]ure of the screen, but it presents to the eye the appearance of a metallic surface, such as deposited silver, or some other metal would furnish. On theoretical grounds the image that the picture transmits to the eye from a highly reflecting surface is more brilliant than one seen on a dead matt surface. This stands to reason, as the latter will absorb more of the light. Certainly the pictures shown in Nicoland, although transmitted along the great length of a comparatively large hall, struck me as being very bright indeed, and generally, I think, the "Solar Screen" is advantageous to use on the grounds stated. I would like, however, if Mr. Simpson would give me the opportunity some time of making some comparisons with the same picture on a dull surface and reflecting surface side by side. I have an idea that some years ago in London John Andetson, of stereoscopic projection fame, brought out a silver surface for lantern projection.

Nicoland is a handsome, well appointed hall, and a very fine type, indeed, of the carefully conducted Nickelodeon. The programme I saw consisted entirely of moving pictures without vaudeville. More than ever am I convinced that the exhibitors should have a hand in selecting the pictures that are shown at their halls—that they should not be either at the mercy of the renters or a board of "censors," for the latter of which I, at any rate, have no use at all. This programme was exceedingly good in parts. "Mr. Jenkins Washes Up" is the title of a funny film in which Jenkins displaces his wife in the washing up business, and clumsily smashes all the crockery to the painful horror of the good woman. He, however, by some magic art, not clear to the audience, succeeds in mending the crockery, which flies into its proper place in the kitchen and so there is general joy. The Great Northern film of the "Blind Foundling," which I saw next, is a very fine piece of photography and stage craft. It tells in several scenes the history of a girl born blind, who passes through some painful experiences before she is restored to the arms of her mother. Now, I beg to protest in the most emphatic manner possible against the exhibition on the silent stage of physical deformities or defects. They are not pleasant to contemplate in real life; they are positively repellant to most minds on the stage. This girl becomes a waitress amongst dissolute men, two of whom fight a duel; then she is decoyed by criminals, beaten, turned adrift, and the door is open for suggestion that even a worse fate than this befalls her. I submit that this is not a pleasant theme to show ladies and children, and those around me at Nicoland the other day evidently had the same opinion. The picture had a very depressing effect. I hope my good friends of the Great Northern Film Company will take this stricture in the best part and not send out such sombre subjects in future. Better by far, was the "Paper Cock-a-Doodles," by Pathe; a most exquisitely colored film showing the weird contortions and movements of these paper toys. By the way, in this film there was shown a spirited little dance executed by a bevy of charming girls. I lost my heart to each and every one of these dears—upon my word I did. More of this sort of subject, Messrs. Pathe! Another film was characteristically French—it is called "It's Only the Painter." This is a Pathe and conceived in the broadest spirit of French farce. Madame is indiscreet enough to receive the visit of an admirer in the absence of her lawful spouse. Upon the unexpected return of the latter Lothario poses as a painter and as the front of the house is actually being done up, he has a very rough time of it amongst the real workmen and is finally driven off. It is a laughable film with the slightest soupcon of French suggestiveness about it, and I am curious to know what the amateur clerical censors will say to this and similar productions.

It is to be hoped that the inhabitants of the Bronx largely patronize, Nicoland, as it is evidently a well-conducted moving picture theater.

OBSERVATIONS BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

Surprises and events have followed each other rapidly during the past few weeks. The cancellation of the licenses of prominent film exchanges, not to say anything about the effect produced by the court dissolving the temporary injunction against a film exchange that refused to give service to a customer who would not secure a license from the Patents Company. It was fully expected that the opposition would attempt to minimize the effect of this decision by claiming that the suit was a mutual frame up between Mr. P. G. Williams and the Patents Company in order to get a speedy decision to be used in whipping stubborn exhibitors into line. Talk of this kind was indulged in by some, but it failed in effect. It contained too much of the element of folly to survive, for everyone having the slightest acquaintance with Mr. Williams and his polices of the past knows that his time is too valuable to permit him to give any of it in that direction. Mr. Williams is looked upon in the theatrical profession as being generous to an extent that applies to any other manager in that line of business, but so far there is no case on record that shows where he has allowed his generosity to indulge in pulling chestnuts out of the fire for others, especially so where he would be going out of his line of business. Mr. Williams is a business man and when he acts you can bet your yellowbacks it is in the interest of his affairs. More than this, his little legal tilt with the Patents Company was not his first grapple in the cause of independence. Several years ago he made a strong fight against the combination of vaudeville houses. It is true that he is now in the combination, but it reflects no unfavorable light upon him. Both sides found the fight was too expensive to be maintained and a mutually satisfied understanding was reached to bring it to a close. It was Mr. Williams' experience in this fight that caused him to accept the decision of the court in the injunction proceedings gracefully. His determination from the first was to test the license question in court and to take out licenses if the decision went against him without waste of time and money in appeals. The signature of the judge who decided the case had hardly dried upon the decree when Mr. Williams applied for his license. There is absolutely no truth in the statement that he bowed to the inevitable and paid for his license to March 8 to give him time to make other arrangements. He has also paid for his license to April 1 and, unless his representatives do not know what they are talking about, his theaters will continue operating under the Patents licenses so long as he can secure satisfactory service under them. In the event of the service not meeting with his approval, he will have the right of all other licensees, to surrender his licenses and secure service elsewhere.

So much for the Williams case, with one exception. The suit was not based upon the point that the film exchange refused to serve him because he refused to pay the license fee. The contention was well defined. Mr. Williams was not disposed to recognize the Patents Company and the film exchange refused to serve him until he secured a license from that company. This is stated in justice to all. Mr. Williams made his fight on principle. The fees required for the license he looked upon as but a drop in the bucket.

Much has been said about the right of the Motion Picture Patents Company to demand a license fee from exhibitors using films made by the companies that hold Patents licenses. Those who read the article on page 301 of the Moving Picture World of March 13, will agree that this question has been fought to an issue. Over a dozen suits in replevin were instituted to recover possession of films in the hands of unlicensed exhibitors. The World did not mention that number of cases in the article referred to, but it is a fact nevertheless. There were eight or nine separate suits in New York and Brooklyn alone. As usual, the opposition is fighting step by step and the idea is impressed upon exhibitors that the suits are only bluffs and the suits are brought against small exhibitors who have not the means to test the point in the courts. Be that as it may, it does not give the exhibitors the use of the films in question. Why not abandon all this talk about bluffs and get down to business? If the exhibitors are too poor to fight the replevins individually, why do they not come to some understanding whereby a test case could be made under joint expenses? It is not the intention here to create business for the lawyers, but to bring about a decisive settlement of the question by the courts and let the exhibitors know just where they stand. It does the exhibitors no good to tell them that the Patents Company has no right to replevin the films. If the company has the right then the exhibitors are being deluded. Get to work and settle the matter. The Patents Company has taken the first decisive step. It is now the opposition's move, as the chess player would say.

On my tour of Nickelodeons during the past week some exhibitors said to me: "I would just like to see any of those Patents people come in my place and walk out with any of my films, license or no license." This kind of personal liberty talk is all right so far as it goes. Every man's home is his castle and all that, but just the same every day we see furniture and articles of household use carried out of the castles in spite of vigorous protests of the occupants. "There is a reason," "Circumstances alter cases," and a lot of other current sayings may be quoted in conjunction with the old saw, "What is the use of butting your head against a stone wall," "Be sure you're right, then go ahead," etc. If the Patents Company people swooped down on the exhibitors' places like a band of cowboys on a rampage, or a bunch of Black Hands in search of the tainted coin, the defiance would be justified. But this is not the procedure. The films are taken in due process of law and the only way to combat it is by a similar process. Neither bluff nor violence will accomplish anything more than bring about a still further entanglement with the law.

Now what are there replevin proceedings? Take the facts and throw all sentiment and prejudice aside. The Motion Picture Patents Company declares that it is not making a fight against the Independents; that the latter can pursue the even tenor of its way without molestation and serve all the film exchanges and exhibitors it sees fit; but the Patents Company is determined that no exhibitor will be permitted to use its licensed films until such exhibitor shall become properly licensed. When they find an unlicensed exhibitor using licensed films they go into court with this statement of facts: "These licensed motion pictures are not sold outright, but leased by the various licensed manufacturers and importers, so that the latter may at all times retain title and be in a position to recover possession of such pictures should they be found in the hands of exchanges or exhibitors not entitled to use them," and upon this the writ of replevin is issued. The term "replevin" is puzzling to many exhibitors. For their benefit the definition is a writ for the recovery of goods that are not held under legal right. This is not an interpretation of the term as a lawyer would put it, but it is the way it reads in plain English. It may also be information to the exhibitors to know that when a writ of replevin is issued the party securing it must give a bond to indemnify the officer who executes the writ against any claim for damages by the party affected in case he should show that he was legally entitled to the property taken from him. When this is taken into consideration it would seem that when the Motion Picture Patents Company puts up a bond in each replevin suit it feels pretty confident that it is well backed up in law.

Several exhibitors have asked why the Patents Company allows its licensed exchanges to rent films to unlicensed exhibitors and get them into trouble. The answer is that from the developments of the past two weeks it is quite evident the company not only does not permit this, but is cancelling the contract of every exchange that does it. At least five prominent exchanges have had their contracts cancelled. At least two of them have suffered cancellation for not requiring their customers to obtain licenses.

In the last issue of the Moving Picture World the editor commented on the unjust accusation by some people that his paper is the mouthpiece of the Patents Company because it published warning notices to the film exchanges to observe the terms of agreement with that company. If I may be permitted to do so, let me suggest to the editor not to allow such little things to worry him. If the Supreme Being should come upon earth and point out to the people the errors of their ways a certain number would call a mass meeting to demand that they be not interfered with. If you come upon a drowning man you would be a poor specimen of humanity if you withheld a helping hand, or failed to give a warning cry if you saw a fellow-being unconsciously or negligently approaching the brink of a precipice. Don't worry, Mr. Editor, so long as you state the situations as you honestly believe they exist you will always have the majority of the people with you. Give false color to events in order to cater to any particular body or faction and you reap the scorn of even your best friends. OLIVER.

Notes from Chicago.

An amusing incident happened to me the other day as I was walking around town. A crowd of five or six persons were standing in the blizzard waiting to get into a 5 cent theater. Curious, I bought a check and joined the crowd. I thought that there must be something wonderful inside, as the management could not take care of those patiently waiting on the sidewalk. I inquired. You may believe me or not, but the reason was not a full house, not even half a one; no, sir. The manager was doing a vaudeville stunt all by himself, and got rattled if anybody entered when he was on the floor, thus the crowd had to wait until the manager was through. Can you beat it? It is quite pathetic, this love of a picture fiend for his pictures. He will do almost anything for his pictures. He will even wait out on the sidewalk in the cold for half an hour at a time, if they are good ones. Credit must be given where credit belongs. They are running fine pictures in this little place, far superior to those of all the theaters in the neighborhood, and they've got a crackerjack of an illustrated song singer.

We have got another specimen of a manager in this town. He is fond of talking. He gives a little speech now and then between the pictures, and sometimes even during the performances. His theater is not a moving picture theater, and he advertises the fact in huge lettering; also no cheap illustrated song singers. It would certainly be an injustice to call the junk he is running moving pictures. The pictures are sometimes good and sometimes bad. The feature about this place are the speeches. Every act elicits some comment as to the sacrifice he is making by supplying his theater with such expensive vaudeville acts. He says he is glad he can afford to do it. He does not depend upon that theater for a living. Oh, no; it can bear the heavy expenses, that is all; and nothing gratifies him so much as to give the public a real treat, which he hopes they appreciate. I don't know if the gentleman is ambitious enough to run for chairman in politics, but I would not be surprised if he is. Daily practice on a patient audience may be a stepladder for enterprising exhibitors; but I do not wish to encourage those around the country to follow suit. My sympathies are with the public.

I believe the average exhibitor would increase his patronage if he cut vaudeville out altogether. Two reels of motion pictures and good illustrated songs are appreciated by the public—far more than the exhibitor thinks. It has proven so in many instances. I know of another one—the case of Keith & Proctor in New York City, who turned over three of their largest vaudeville houses to motion pictures and illustrated songs, exclusively, and are making more money out of this style of amusement than they have done before. When the average exhibitor loses his patrons, he does not, as a rule, improve his film service. The trouble is that his cutthroat competitor has put on another vaudeville stunt, and so does he, and maybe he cuts down a poor film service; the result is a vaudeville bill every week that sometimes does not pay expenses.

When mingling with the audiences of 5 cent theaters, I take pains to analyze the statements of the public. I attended, the other day, a fine performance at a 10 cent house on Madison street. There were five vaudeville acts and one reel of film. The bill was good and I enjoyed it. Two ladies sitting behind me commented on the show. "Well, of course, the soubrette was 40 and her hair—I wonder how she does it." Suddenly she made a remark that made me sit up and take notice. "I think," said she, "they give too much vaudeville here and not enough pictures. I don't go to 5 and 10 cent shows to see vaudeville; I like pictures just as well." The moving picture is a production of dramatic art, far stronger and of a more realistic nature than the real play can ever attempt to be. We see thrilling episodes, and pictures of life that never can be accomplished on any stage. With such realism and naturalism, speech is unnecessary.

There is something wonderful in the near future coming out on the market in the shape of a talking picture machine with perfect synchronism between sound and picture—the result of years of experimenting by a Chicago firm. We believe that our friend, George K. Spoor, can give some information about it.

LICENSED MANUFACTURERS VS. EMPIRE FILM EXCHANGE.

Replevin Suits Started By Motion Picture Patents Company.

The Motion Picture Patents Company, acting for the nine licensed manufacturers and importers, has, on the affidavit of D. Macdonald, general manager of the company, entered into action against the Empire Film Company, of 108 Fulton street, New York, for the recovery of possession of films manufactured by its licensees.

The essential portions of Mr. Macdonald's affidavit are as follows:

"2. That the plaintiff is the owner and is entitled to "the immediate possession of the films named.

"3. Upon information and belief, that the said chattels "are wrongfully detained by the defendant; that the "grounds of deponent's belief as to the allegation are "statements made by employees of the plaintiff who have "been specially investigating the matters herein referred "to, and statements made by customers of the defendant's "who have exhibited said chattels while temporarily in "their possession, and the perusal of records prepared by "or for the plaintiff, showing the names of all persons "entitled to the possession of such chattels, and de-"ponent's personal knowledge that defendants are not "entitled to the possession thereof.

"4. That the alleged cause of the detention thereof, "according to the best knowledge, information and be-"lief of deponent, is that the defendant claims to be "entitled to the possession of said chattels by virtue of "an alleged lease from some third person or persons, to "deponent unknown, although in fact no person had any "right to lease said chattels to the defendants.

"8. That prior to the commencement of this action "plaintiff demanded of defendants the possession of said "chattels and the defendants refused to deliver the same "to the plaintiff."

The replevin was made by the plaintiff's attorneys on March 15, and the summons is returnable within 20 days from that date.

Mr. Kessell, the president of the Empire Film Company, does not care to say what his course of action will be, but he is greatly incensed over the fact that his premises should have been invaded and his business jeopardized by the officers of the law who made search for the films named in the bill of complaint. Mr. Kessell says that none of the films were found in his possession. He admits to having had three of the two dozen or more specified and he says that he can show receipted bills to prove that these were purchased in the ordinary course of business. He also says that previous to entering his place of business and making search for these films, neither the Motion Picture Patents Company nor any of their agents had ever made demand for the possession of said films either to himself or any of his employees.

Mr. Kessell believes that he has a clear claim for heavy damages, as his business has suffered greatly because of the indignities to which his customers were subjected and the reports which have been circulated.

As this is only one of many similar suits which have been and will be started by the Motion Picture Patents Company under Clause 2 of the agreement between the licensed manufacturers and the exchanges, the outcome will be watched with interest by the whole trade.

PITTSBURG LODGE NO. 1. EXHIBITORS' PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION.

Exhibitors: Wake Up and Protect Your Interests!

The slogan of every exhibitor of moving pictures in these days should be "Organize, organize and never stop organizing." Only through concerted action will the exhibitors be able to wield that influence to which their position and their numbers surely entitle them.

For this reason, certain of the exhibitors of Pittsburg met on the afternoon of February 1, 1909, at 438 Market street, to talk over the situation and to try and effect an organization, the objects of which are set forth below:

Objects.

1st. So that the exhibitors may become better acquainted with each other and those from districts in which two or more houses are competing might meet and mutually profit by discussing the needs of the business in their particular district.

2d. To get the exhibitors to work in harmony with each other, leading to better profits for all and the abolishing of cut-throat competition.

3d. To create a fund, from monthly dues, to aid in the prevention of unjust legislation, either on the part of the State or the city, or from any other source whatever.

4th. To place the business on a higher moral plane.

5th. To establish an exchange, through which the exhibitor might secure employees, such as operators, piano players, singers, cashiers and ushers, upon a moment's notice.

6th. To provide quarters, centrally located down town, where exhibitors may drop in, use the 'phone, or transact other business while delayed by their film exchange.

The first meeting was attended by representatives from seventeen houses. An organization was effected, and Mr. Balsdon, of Royer & Balsdon, The Casino, Allegheny, was elected president, and Mr. Graham, of the Cnic, Market street, Pittsburg, secretary and treasurer. A charge of $5 was voted as the fee for membership in the Association, with monthly dues of $2.

Forty houses have already become members of the Association and more have pledged their support. Arrangements have been made for permanent headquarters, third floor, 438 Market street (entrance 5 Masters way), where either Secretary Graham or Vice-President Williams is always in attendance. You are cordially invited to call.

Our regular meeting day is Friday, at 2 o'clock. Kindly arrange to have your membership fee paid before the next regular meeting so you will have a vote in the meeting. No one admitted at regular meetings except members.

THE INTERNATIONAL COMPANY'S SUPPLY OF FILMS.

Mr. Harstn, the Eastern agent of the company, informs us that he has received telegrams from J. J. Murdock president of the International Projecting and Producing Company, advising him that they have in stock enough material for four weeks' supply, and that every steamer is bringing more and more film to this country. The reports in circulation about the I. P. P. Co. not being able to fulfil their contracts in supplying the various exchanges that are handling Independent goods with films of the European makers, and for which they have the exclusive agency for this country, are untrue. The authors of these rumors think that by spreading rumors throughout the country about the I. P. P. Co. they gain a point, whereas, all exhibitors will be in a position to use Independent service offered by the I. P. P. Co. The I. P. P. Co. at the present time holds in stock more than enough of film to supply all the exhibitors beginning March 22; as there are now shipments coming in daily on every steamer which arrives from Europe, there are more and more films being accumulated on the shelves of the I. P. P. Co. ready for delivery to the various film exchanges. Next Monday, March 22, the I. P. P. Co. will have in New York City, in the offices of Harstn & Co., at least 20 reels and about 10 prints of everything to make up the 20 reels to supply each individual exchange around New York City and vicinity. They are also sending large shipments all over the country to be released on exactly the same day, March 22. They assert that film renting business is in a better condition to-day than it ever was before. They are taking on a lot of trade every day in all their various offices, as well as all the exchanges that they are supplying with film, and for next week they have a lot of new contracts signed up with different exhibitors.

On another page we give a list of films that will be released by the Independents. If all equal the quality of those we have seen, there should be no more complaints from independent exhibitors that they cannot get a good and plentiful supply of film. We understand that the Independents have on hand their supply for three weeks and the issues for the fourth week are on the water.

New York, March 11.—Charles H. Perry, through his attorney, Henry M. Russell, of 39 Broadway, New York, has instituted suit to recover $280, alleged to be the balance due him for salary as general manager of the American Fotofone Company, a Delaware corporation, whose offices are with S. P. McConnell, at 111 Broadway, New York.

CONGRESS AND THE MOVING PICTURE "TRUST."

The result of the investigation referred to in the appended resolution, which is extracted from the Congressional Record, will naturally be viewed with much interest in the moving picture field of the United States. Meanwhile the resolution itself appears to be based upon insufficient knowledge of the facts of the situation, and to be very vaguely drafted, as it refers to a "so-called" combination, thus implying the presence of a doubt in the mind of its author as to whether there actually exists such a combination. Moreover "said so-called" and "causes of the ability" are not models of literary lucidity. We hardly agree with a Chicago contemporary that this document is "self-explanatory," however desirable the investigation referred to may be. But we await developments and results.

"In the House of Representatives, February 23 (calendar day, March 3), 1909, Mr. McDermott submitted the following resolution: 'Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is requested to institute a thorough investigation immediately of the so-called "combination" on the part of the manufacturers of moving picture machines and films therefor in the United States to control prices, with a view to discovering how far an agreement between the various manufacturers of such products operates to fix the price of moving picture machines and films produced in the United States, the causes of the ability of the manufacturers to combine, and the cost to the consumers and users resulting from said so-called "moving picture combination," and with suggestions as to remedies; also with a view to criminally prosecuting parties combined to control and manipulate the market and the prices of moving picture machines and films.'"

"TOWARD THE NORTH POLE."

The Great Northern Film Company releases to-day under this title one of the most beautiful films it has ever shown. It is what its name indicates, a series of views made in high Northern latitudes, and representing scenery there. Mountain and crag, ice, snow and water, the midnight sun, the North Cape village life amid the snows are all prominent features of the film.

The picture is particularly attractive because of its artistic tinting, which represents the rocks in their natural colors and makes of the snow and ice touches of beauty in color and tone. As a scenic and educational film this should prove exceptionally popular. Those latitudes are always interesting and to have them brought to one's door is indeed a treat.

The Chicago Film Exchange is doing a large business over in their new, elegant headquarters at 42-46-48-50 Jackson boulevard. The Chicago Film Exchange, as is well known, are the pioneers of the independent movement in Chicago and the organizers of the Independents in the West. Mr. Harry Lewis is just back from Europe with a select consignment of films waiting for inspection at the Custom House. Every Wednesday afternoon Independent exhibitors assemble to witness the exhibition of the films released that week by the Chicago Film Exchange. Some very fine subjects of the best French and Italian makers were shown to a representative of this paper the other week.

"THE MYSTERIOUS DOUBLE."

The next film to come from the Kalem studio will be released March 26. It is entitled "The Mysterious Double; or, The Two Girls Who Looked Alike." The building up of a story around two girls who look alike is novel, and the working out of the plot holds the interest to the end. A pretty love story is woven into the plot. The complications which arise from the resemblance of the two girls are sufficiently strong to hold the interest at a high pitch.

PATHE'S "RETURN OF ULYSSES"

Released to-day is a magnificently staged and acted dramatization of the Greek story of Penelope and Ulysses. When we consider that the actors were leading members of the Comedie Francaise, we begin to realize the serious effort that is being made to elevate the silent drama.

Penelope and Telemachus, From Pathe s "Return of Ulysses"

The Essanay Company have made their mark in comedy and some of their supporters have advised that they should stick to that line, but their issue of last week, "The Road Agents," shows that in drama they are equally strong, if not more so. The manager of Keith's Theater, Union square, where we saw this film, informed us that it was the feature film and that the great assemblage in the Bijou Dream, which is always a very critical audience, watched the splendid scenery and horsemanship and the hold-up of the stage with breathless attention. We are informed that this film was censored in a Western town that is becoming very sensitive as to its code of morals, but in the whole film there is not one scene that we could see any possible objection to. The mere fact that a hold-up was shown in one scene only records what has been a common occurrence in the West and the graphic manner in which swift justice is dealt out to the marauders is a wholesome object lesson to gentlemen of the road to mend their ways.

MOTION PICTURE PATENTS COMPANY.

THEIR POLICY AND PROCEDURE.

The events of the past week, the replevin suits and search warrants that have been executed, would indicate that the Motion Picture Patents Company is not a case of "bluff," as has been hinted in some quarters. So that the moving picture business may smoothly progress we have tried to point out the rocks and shoals, and we want to make clear to everyone—licensed exchange or unlicensed exchange, licensed exhibitor or unlicensed exhibitor—the course they must pursue if they wish to avoid legal entanglements.

The actions that have already been started by the Moving Picture Patents Company is only a forerunner of the steps that will be taken to protect the interests of their licensees. Their policy is not to coerce anyone to taking the service of the licensed exchanges, but they are firm, and their position is legally clear, that anyone who handles or exhibits their leased products can only do so by being duly licensed and abiding by all the terms of the agreement. They have no desire to monopolize the film business, at least they make public assurance that this is not their motive. Unlicensed exchanges and exhibitors are free to use any and all films that are not made by their licensees, but the most vigorous steps will be taken to prevent the indiscriminate use of both independent and licensed film by any exhibitor or exchange.

Licensed Film will be Replevined.

At a meeting of the manufacturers, held in the offices of the Patents Company, on March 16, it was decided that the policy of seizing and holding, by means of replevin suits, any and all licensed films used by unlicensed theaters, will be vigorously continued.

Many replevin suits have been started. We only instance the case of the Empire Film Exchange and the exhibitors that were supplied by them, who have had licensed films taken out of their places. The importance of this action was so great that we have taken the pains to get the opinion of several lawyers, and the consensus of opinion is that the Moving Picture Patents Company are acting within their legal rights and that their action will be upheld in the courts.

Violations of the Release Day Rule which provides that films shall not be exhibited until the day agreed upon, will be punishable with a fine of not less than $100 or a revocation of the exchange license.

Star, Pennsylvania and Wonderland Exchanges Reinstated.

The revocation of the licenses of the Star Film Exchange of Chicago, the Pennsylvania Film Exchange and the Wonderland Film Exchange of Pittsburg, was taken up on the petitions from each of these offices for reinstatement. It appeared that while violations had occurred, the mistakes made were the result of acts of subordinates and not due to reckless or intentional disregard of the conditions of the license agreement. Under these circumstances, the Patents Company has accepted from each of these exchanges a written waiver of all claims to the film seized, an acknowledgment of the error, and have imposed a heavy fine in each case, and these three exchanges have been reinstated.

New Exchange.

Miles Bros., who, through an agent, have handled a considerable portion of the business in and around Baltimore, Md., have been granted a branch office in that city.

OFFICIAL STATEMENT BY M. P. P. COMPANY.

The Motion Picture Patents Company have issued the following document defining their policy:

"Every possible effort is being made by the Motion Picture Patents Company to provide pictures that have either an educational, moral or cleanly-amusing effect upon those who view them, and to absolutely prevent the production and supply to its licensed exhibitors throughout the country of any film whose subject is of a questionable nature. It is well known that in the past certain objectionable pictures have been on view; but since the formation of the Patents Company a most earnest and strenuous campaign has been carried on toward the abolishment of all such material and the prevention of its further production. With this end in view, the Patents Company has secured an agreement from all of its licensed manufacturers and importers. The following licensees are included:

"Edison Manufacturing Company,
"American Mutoscope and Biograph Company,
"Essanay Film Manufacturing Company,
"Kalem Company,
"George Kleine,
"Lubin Manufacturing Company,
"Pathe Freres,
"Selig Polyscope Company,
"Vitagraph Company of America.

Censorship Board.

"The Patents Company's Board of Censors will work in conjunction with the recently established Board of Censorship of Programs of Motion Picture Shows, which is composed of such well-known leaders as Charles Sprague Smith, president of the People's Institute; Rev. Walter Laidlaw, of the Federation of Churches; Thos. L. McClintock, of the Society for Prevention of Crime; Gustave Straubemiller and Evangeline C. Whitney, of the Board of Education; Mrs. Joseph M. Price, of the Public Education Association; Miss M. Serena Townsend, of the Woman's Municipal League; Rev. George William Knox, of the Ethical Social League; Howard M. Bradstreet, of the Neighborhood Workers' Association; Mrs. Josephine Bedding, John Collier and Albert Shields.

"To look over the above list of names is surely to become convinced of the sincerity of the movement, and must lead to the conclusion that the death-knell of the cheap and low-toned picture show has been sounded.

"That the motion picture is an educational factor of tremendous importance has long been realized by all, and there is no reason why the quality of the pictures should not be such that children of any age might enjoy them and be morally benefited, as there is an unquestioned demand for such subjects in all parts of the country, which insures a monetary return perhaps greater than the careless exhibitions that have been more or less in vogue.

"The Motion Picture Patents Company and the Board of Censorship have joined hands in a determination to positively stamp out any pictures that are not wholly desirable, no matter what the cost.

"The movement will be national in scope, and will be put into immediate operation."

Notes and Comments.

Mr. Berst, the resident manager for Pathe Freres, sailed on Thursday to consult with the heads of the firm.

Mr. S. Long, of the Kalem Company, will sail for Europe on April 2 for a stay of some weeks. While he goes primarily for pleasure, he may combine a little business with it.

E. Albert Smith, of the Vitagraph Company of America, is enjoying the first vacation that he has had for years at the home of his parents, in Santa Barbara, Cal. A picture postal card just received shows Mr. Smith seated on a spirited horse and wearing his usual smile as he admires the rich foliage that skirts the roadways of Southern California.

Selig's next issue, "Four Wise Men of Dobbinsville," is a well worked out comedy which introduces a splendid representation of the Mardi Gras celebration at New Orleans. Four country jays get up a scheme to make their wives believe they are each called away to attend to sick relatives, whereas they meet at the festival and have a high old time, but get bamcoed and finally land in prison, from which they are released by their wives. The situations, the scenery and the very excellent comedy make this a film that will appeal to any audience and be popular wherever shown.

The American Film Service, of Chicago, are now installed in their new and commodious offices on the third floor of the Security building, where they are doing a large business. Buying eighteen reels of new licensed film each week ranks this firm as one of the leading exchanges in the country. The success of the American exchange is due to the able management of Mr. Van Runkel, who is one of the most popular film renters in Chicago and throughout the West. By an error in our last issue Mr. Laemmle was credited with supplying the service to Mr. George Hines' place, the Senate. As a matter of fact that theater is supplied by the American Film Service. We do not know of any film exchange that has made more rapid and solid progress than the American, which speaks well for the satisfaction of their customers.

Comments on Film Subjects.

"The Iron Worker."—Selig has come to be a name which means a good story, well told, and a good film technically. The stories sent out by this house are graphic, they are well acted, they are appropriately staged and they undoubtedly represent as good as there is in American film production. In the story of "The Ironworker" Selig presents a graphic account of the efforts of a rival to kill a young man who aspires to the hand of the daughter of the proprietor of the mill. The young man loses his place and is set upon by the superintendent and seriously hurt. But the villain is run to earth and the young man marries the girl of his choice. The love story could have been told as well of any other worker, but the views of the iron works, including the pouring of the molten metal are extremely good and represent the highest development of art in moving picture making of this type. The staging had to be done in a foundry and the scenes therein are very realistic and convincing. The story woven around it adds interest, but does not strengthen the picture, which would be impossible. The action is spirited and the characters' work quite convincing.

"The Salvation Army Lass."—This is a record film as well as a picture which holds the audience from the beginning to the end in almost breathless emotion. Because of a drunken brawl a girl is turned first from her boarding house and then from the store where she is employed. While wandering alone she meets a shoplifter who sympathizes with her and takes her to a den of thieves. There she is shown what the sympathizing woman wants of her. She breaks away and runs into the arms of a Salvation Army lass, from whom she had been previously taken by the shoplifter. She joins the army and in going back into the saloon where the drunken row occurred, which cost her so much, she finds her lover, who has been discharged from prison. She undertakes to convert him, but he merely laughs at her. She finds him on the street and begs him to leave his evil ways, but he refuses and strikes her to the ground. But after various vicissitudes he is also reclaimed and they go away together with happiness beaming from both their faces. This is a Biograph film, worked out with all the attention to detail that characterizes the work of that house. The scenes showing the Salvation Army are absolutely correct, showing their services exactly as they occur. The interior scene is inside the Bowery mission and is true as well as the others. This film could be used with profit by religious organizations, even though they may not altogether approve of the work of the Salvation Army. It is one of the best the Biograph people have produced.

"The Road Agent."—This picture from the Essanay studio has some excellent qualities. It tells a story connectedly. From the time the picture appears on the screen until it disappears the thread of the tale is perfectly plain. It is the story of a road agent who mingled with the people who crossed the plains in the old staging days, ascertaining how much money they carried, and obtaining other information of that character, and then with a confederate holding up the stage and robbing the passengers. In this instance the agent and his confederate, a Mexican, quarrel over the division of the spoil and the Mexican stabs the agent. The latter manages to crawl to the road in time to tell the sheriff's posse the story before he dies. The Mexican is finally captured and the stolen valuables recovered. The staging of this film is exceptionally good. The background of the sandy desert, with the cactus and sage brush is excellent, and the photography is beyond criticism. To one who has been through the country portrayed it is very natural. Some scenes appear so real that one almost feels as though he were there. The Essanay people are to be congratulated upon the success they have achieved in this elaborate picture.

"The Ringleader."—A picture from Pathe which illustrates a phase of labor disturbances in France. A lazy workman is discharged and incites the others to strike and riot. One faithful man is killed and as his body is borne to the grave the workmen come to their senses and set upon the instigator and drive him away. The picture is full of thrilling scenes and conveys its lesson which should not be lost upon those who cherish the same views of employers and capitalists.

"Cremation on the Ganges."—An Urban film which illustrates the method of disposing of bodies at the burning ghats along the Ganges River in India. It is well photographed and while the subject is more or less disgusting, it is none the less interesting and instructive.

"Buying a Title."—An Edison film in which a father tells his daughter that she must marry a title and ruthlessly orders her lover from the house. He then sends to a matrimonial agency which searches for a title and finds a count acting as waiter in a restaurant. The parents visit the agency, and are so pleased with the count that they invite him to their home to see their daughter. She is dejected, inasmuch as she doesn't care particularly about counts. But she and her lover fix up the plan to have the maid impersonate her. The maid has a lover in the shape of the policeman on the beat and when he sees through the window the count very ardently making love to his girl the pseudo count is very unceremoniously run out and down the steps, leaving the girl and her lover to enjoy the exit of the count in the highest possible degree. It is a good comedy and gets liberal applause.

"Reforming a Husband."—A Lubin comedy which might be said to convey a lesson of importance in domestic affairs. On returning from the wedding journey a young husband is successively told that he must not smoke, play cards or drink, and actually stops—at home. But he goes to the club, and when his wife gathered up his scattered belongings the next morning, she concluded it was easier to reform a wife than a husband. She gave him a cigar and offered him a drink, and probably their bliss was perennial after that.

"Voice of the Violin."—A Biograph picture which ought to command attention from critical audiences and which is lively enough to attract any one. A music master, rejected by an heiress, joins a band of anarchists. He is one of two selected by lot to blow up the home of a hated capitalist. While watching outside the door he hears a violin playing one of his own compositions. He discovers from this that it is the home of the girl he loves. He rushes to the cellar where his confederate is about to light the fuse on the fatal bomb. He tries to prevent it, but is overpowered, bound and left to share the fate of the inmates of the house. He struggles violently and succeeds in biting the fuse in two before the bomb is ignited. He is found shortly after, taken up stairs, and the ending is happy enough to suit the most exacting. The acting is good, the staging could scarcely be better, and interest is maintained to the end. This film should have a long run.

"The Little Rag Doll."—A little child sits at a door holding her pet rag doll in this Lubin picture. A Gypsy comes by and takes the little one away, who still clutches her doll. The child is sold to a wealthy woman who brings her up as her own daughter. The heartbroken parents live their sad lives, wondering what has become of their little girl and grieving for her daily. After twelve years the father, who is a glazier, is asked into a house to replace a broken pane. He espies the rag doll in a case, where the girl has treasured it all her life. He recognizes it and this leads to a reunion of the long separated family. The wealthy woman instead of giving up the girl takes her parents home with her. It is a good story, well told, and in most scenes the technical quality is satisfactory. There are weak places in the lighting, but the story grips the heart and leads one to sympathize with the grief stricken parents and rejoice with them when the lost child is recovered.

"The New Mirror."—A Lubin story which has an element of novelty. A husband starts out in the morning and decides to purchase his wife a dresser with a handsome mirror as a surprise. It is sent home and she has it put in her room. Meanwhile a burglar has entered the house and hides behind the lace curtains as the dresser and mirror is brought into the room. While smoothing her hair before the mirror she sees the burglar leave his place behind the curtain and secrete himself under the bed. She finishes smoothing her hair, and then goes to the telephone and calls the police. The burglar leaves his hiding place as soon as she goes down stairs and begins picking up valuables. The police arrive in time to see him disappear through the window and over the roof. But they finally catch him. It is a pretty story and the element of novelty is so well worked out that it causes the audience to watch with intense interest every move of all the actors.

"The Misadventures of a Sheriff."—In this Pathe a sheriff is shown in the pursuit of his vocation of ejecting tenants for landlords. In one place he is tied hand and foot and locked up in a cabinet. The cabinet is lowered from an upper window, striking someone below as it descends. He cuts the rope and it falls to the street. It is then loaded on a cart and has various disturbing experiences before it finally lands at the police station where the prisoner is released. It is funny and the audience watches the movements of that cabinet with great interest.

"A Midnight Supper."—Here is one of those lively Edison films which never fail to please. The young women at a seminary determine to have a midnight supper to celebrate a school victory. They have accumulated a portion of the necessary stores and have hidden them in the stovepipe. The janitor comes to remove the stove and all kinds of trouble and complications ensue. The janitor finds an invitation and gives it to the principal. She sets him to watch over the room so that no one can enter. The girls creep out and set the clock back so that when he wakes up he finds it is still more than an hour to the time appointed for the supper. He sits down and goes to sleep. The supper is over before he wakes up. One of the girls ties the rope of the fire alarm to the janitor's leg. When he gets up he sets the fire alarm ringing and arouses the whole school. The police arrive, take in the situation and remain to laugh and the picture ends with the audience laughing as vigorously as the girls seem to be doing.

"Love Is Blind."—An Edison film which is funny and is worked out in a novel way. A master and man look much alike and this causes a number of amusing complications. The man is in love with the maid and the mixups and misunderstandings between master and man and mistress and maid are extremely amusing. Finally the master determines to end it by cutting off his beard. The man thinks he will do the same, and unknown to each other they remove their beards and the complications are even more amusing. They don't know each other then and the man gets into a tussle with the master because each thinks the other an intruder in the house. Finally it is all straightened out to the satisfaction of everybody. The technical quality of the film is good and the action is as lively as one might wish.

"Innocent, but Fouund Guilty."—A Gaumont picture in which an innocent man is accused of burning a farm house and the shock of his conviction kills his wife, leaving a little daughter, who is adopted by a kindly woman. It is one of those heart stories which one scarcely likes to see, yet which compels one to watch it through whether one wishes to do so or not. The father is released and is reunited with his daughter after six years. The staging and setting of the picture are excellent and the acting is better than that of some of the Gaumonts'. It is a picture which will interest deeply.

"Three Celebrated Mountain Climbers."—A little comedy from the Eclipse house in which three bombastic individuals start out to climb mountains. When they return the one who actually climbed the least tells the biggest story. The situations and action are very funny. Apart from this the film is well worth seeing for its excellent photography, and whether the crags and precipices are real, or whether they are partly the product of the artist's manipulation they are certainly worth seeing.

"A Jealous Hubby."—A Pathe in which a husband becomes jealous over a letter his wife receives, which proves to be a bill for a hat, and next over a hair, which proves to have come from a pet dog. Some of the situations are extremely funny, particularly when he is trying to match the hair.

"The Runaway Mother-in-Law."—A Pathe in which the mother-in-law is made the butt of a joke. The Pathe people seem to have a spite at the mother-in-law. In this picture the mother-in-law is moving and has her chattels piled on a cart. She seizes the handles of the cart to take it away when it starts and she is unable to stop it. A good many things are knocked down and very many persons join in the chase before the thing ends. It finally brings up in the water.

"Oh, What Lungs."—A comic from the Essanay people which never fails to get a good laugh and in some theaters is applauded. A weak lunged individual goes to a doctor who announces himself as able to cure that ailment. The treatment is applied and the individual emerges from the office with a pair of lungs strong enough to move anything by the mere force of blowing. The situations are very amusing and the comedian of the Essanay studio, Ben Turpin, scores another success.

THE SONGS.

The songs of the week have been better than the previous week. This means that the songs themselves have been better, and even though there were some good slides shown the previous week, those shown the week just closed averaged much better. "I Want Somebody to Play with Me," illustrated by DeWitt C. Wheeler, was a beautiful song and the illustrating was beautifully done. "The Huskin' Bee" was illustrated by Mr. Wheeler and the pictures were unusually good. The settings were so natural that one could almost imagine himself joining the revelers in the barn dance.

It is such songs as are offered now that attract and lead to increased patronage. The latter mentioned song was vigorously applauded and the singer had to respond to a number of encores. With the character of the songs better and the quality of the pictures steadily improving the programmes in all theaters which use songs are strengthened.

A NEW SYNCHRONIZING DEVICE.

Our Mr. Bradlet has just returned from Philadelphia with a very interesting report on a new talking picture machine, a perfect synchronizer, the invention of Mr. S. Lubin. This new synchronizer can be placed on any projecting machine, is connected with the phonograph, the operator has no dial to watch, he does not even need to look at the picture on the screen and the invention seems to be most practicable. Mr. Bradlet has also examined Mr. Lubin's new projecting machine, which has many improvements. One of them is to replace the rewinding belt by a connecting rod, which rod offers many advantages: a greater protection against fire, a saving of the film, etc. As we are going to press, we have to defer this report to one of our next issues.

Mr. Bradlet also hands us the programme of the State Theater, of Trenton, N. J., a show of 2 hours 34 minutes for 5 and 10 cents, and he claims that No. D of the programme, the "Band Roma" (formerly of the New York Hippodrome) gives a concert of 24 minutes which by itself is worth more than the admission for the entire show.

It is needless to point out that such service can mean nothing more than suicide to the exhibitor and is nothing more or less than fool competition between exhibitors who try to drive each other out of business instead of getting together and agreeing upon a defensive business policy.

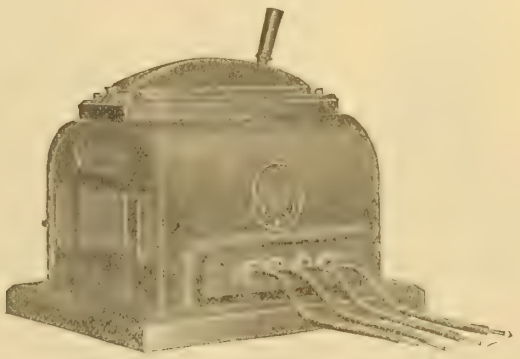
"Economy Arc"

A transforming device especially designed for alternating current arcs.



Runs Cool—Very little power is lost in device itself. Consequently not enough heat is given off to make booth uncomfortable.

Easily Regulated—Simple switch gives 30-40 or 50 amperes, according to density of film and distance from screen.

Absolutely Safe—No connections or switch contacts are exposed, thereby eliminating fire risk due to accidental short circuits. Lamp circuit is not directly connected to supply circuit. No danger from shocks.

Economical—Saving in power varies from 65% to 90% when compared with a rheostat. Does not affect lights on the same circuit and is not open to objections from the central station.

We have a booklet which gives some decidedly interesting facts about the "Economy Arc"—particularly in regard to its economy.

EDISON MFG. CO.

STROLLING PLAYERS. Synopsis of scenes: Of a troupe of strolling players our picture tells. It presents the manners and customs of other times in a vivid manner. We are transported to the age of romance when players were classed with gypsies and vagabonds. The young lord of a manor becomes interested, in a kindly, sympathetic way, in the wife of one of the players, the manager of the troupe. She is a refined, gentle and delicate creature, while he is a drunkard and bully. Unknown to the rustic audience before whom they play, a real drama is enacted, in larger proportions. But, in the end, we see retribution meted out to the guilty, the innocent protected and virtue triumphant. App. length, 900 feet.

A CRY FROM THE WILDERNESS; or, A Tale of the Esquimaux and Midnight Sun.—Synopsis of scenes: A Hudson Bay trader exchanges beads for seal. He falls in love with a girl in the camp. Her young Esquimau lover becomes jealous and tries to injure the trader, but is prevented by the girl. The Esquimau is banished from the camp. Trader blazing the trail. Stops, has lunch and goes on. He stops at a church on the side of a mountain. Prays and goes on down the mountainside. Trader stops at a cabin on mountain; calls to his friend, who is not there; goes on his way. Young Esquimau coming over mountain, stops at cabin and discovers track of trader and follows him, determined to overtake his rival. The trader discovers the loss of his seal from the sleigh. Tries to find it. The Esquimau sneaks up and surprises the trader. Trader sees him and there is a fight for life. Trader slips on ice and Esquimau wounds him. A Royal mounted policeman in the distance sees the fight and discharges his gun at the Esquimau, pursuing him on horseback. The Esquimau rushes for cliff. Mounted policeman after him. They meet and a fight ensues. Esquimau takes policeman's club and beats him with it. He throws the policeman's body over the cliff. Next day. Father of Esquimau girl leaving camp, tells his daughter he will return soon. Going through the Northern woods, he hears a cry for help. He stops, but does not locate the sound. Trader lying in snow, rises up and calls. Too weak, he faints from loss of blood. Father hearing second call, listens and locates the direction from whence it came. He discovers the trader lying in snow. Binds his wounds. Unloads the trader's sleigh and puts him on it. Father pulls sleigh into camp, telling the Esquimaux of his tribe how he found the trader and that he knew that one of their tribe was to blame, as the young Esquimau swore vengeance before leaving. The Esquimaux rush out to find their banished member. The Esquimaux locate their prey and pursue him over the side of a mountain, but he eludes them. They return to camp, and, taking spears, again continue the chase to find him. The Esquimau is surrounded. He sees there is no hope for him and jumps over the ledge of a precipice. Seven months later. The Esquimau girl has nursed the trader back to life. He proposes to the girl and is accepted. Father consents to the union on condition that he (the trader) will renounce his people and always live with the Esquimaux, which he does. App. length, 900 feet.

ESSANAY FILM MFG. CO.

THE ENERGETIC STREET-CLEANER.—A story picture of a man compelled by the stress of circumstances to apply for a position as street-cleaner or "White Wing." To his great delight he is accepted, and he immediately dons his white garb, secures his broom and gets his final instructions from the foreman. His superior has impressed upon his mind the absolute necessity of sweeping everything clean, allowing nothing to escape his eye, and in his zeal he follows his instructions to the letter, much to the discomfiture of the pedestrians who are unfortunate enough to cross his pathway. He covers everyone with dust or mud, sweeping away all particles that he by his carelessness or energy has upset. He upsets a gentleman and lady as the former is tying the latter's shoe; spatters with mud and water two ladies robed in white duck suits; upsets a grocery boy carrying a sack of flour; overturns a dress suit case belonging to a gentleman who is awaiting a car, scattering the contents upon the street; upsets a waiter carrying a tray of food; sweeps the debris of the street into a manhole as a workman is ascending. There is no limit to his energy until at last a crowd of enraged citizens, ladies and gentlemen, complain to the head of the department. After securing the services of a policeman, the superintendent and the crowd start in search of the sweep, find him continuing his glorious work, and pounce upon him, giving him a dose of his own medicine, and succeed in having him discharged. Length, 450 feet.

A MIDNIGHT DISTURBANCE.—A burglar has entered the top story of a flat by means of the fire-escape, and has the misfortune to arouse the occupants. They give chase, forcing the burglar to return to the fire-escape for an exit. Being closely pursued, the thief is compelled to enter the next window below, arousing the tenant in his hasty endeavor to get away. The pursuers are joined by the person disturbed, and the culprit is again forced to make the fire-escape. In and out the windows, on and off the fire-escape, the unfortunate burglar is pursued by the ever-increasing mob, through the hallways, knocking everyone down that comes between him and his freedom. At last his Nemesis appears in the shape of a bulldog, who follows him with a persistency that brings about his capture. A German policeman figures prominently in the picture, also a gentleman about to take a bath. The following crowd is dressed in a variety of costumes that adds greatly to the comical events. All the action takes place either in the interiors or upon the fire-escape in mid-air. Length, 525 feet.

THE MYSTERIOUS DOUBLE; or, The Two Girls Who Looked Alike.—In this film we tell the story of two girls who were exact duplicates—one a member of a band of roving, thieving gypsies, the other an educated, lovely young girl of a fine Southern family. By chance the gypsies wandered into the town where this young girl lived, and as a result a most remarkable mix-up occurred. Scene I.—Aileen's Betrothal to Dustin. Scene II.—Aileen's Double—The Queen of the Gypsies. Scene III.—Carlos Mistakes Aileen for Irene. Scene IV.—Aileen in the Hands of the Gypsies. Scene V.—Dustin Mistakes Irene for Aileen. Scene VI.—Aileen Escapes from the Gypsies. Scene VII.—Aileen Returns to Her Parents. Scene VIII.—Irene Returns to Her Comrades. Scene IX.—The Robbery. Scene X.—Irene Is Captured. Scene XI.—The Death of Irene.

GAUMONT.

(George Kleine.)

POCKET POLICEMAN.—In time of need the citizen takes from his pocket a neatly rolled parcel; this is unrolled and the uniformed officer ready for service is at hand. The maid about to brush her master's coat finds and experiments with the contrivance. It responds to her manipulation and the officer proves himself very popular. Many very funny occurrences are shown and the climax is reached when the substitute officer gets wet and shrinks to miniature size, whereupon he is presented to a child as a doll. Length, 674 feet.

Gaumont Subject.

JAPANESE MAGIC.—This subject presents a series of illusions in which a Japanese lantern, several dolls, chickens, mice and grasshoppers play a very prominent part. Length, 326 feet.

ACROSS THE BORDER.—In the territory adjacent to Paris a little lad at the age of seven finds upon the church stairway a mite of an infant. He carries it to his home and mother, where the little girl is given every care. Together they start out upon a journey to the city of Paris, where they hope to realize their ambitions and acquire fame and fortune by entertaining the public with music and dance. His strong features make him a desirable "catch," and scarcely have they started on their journey when a young woman concludes to win him by either fair or foul means. She endeavors to induce him to forsake his companion, but this he positively refuses to do, as he is all taken up with the charms and accomplishments of the latter. Disappointed, the woman then determines upon a course by which she hopes to outdo her rival. One of her companions conceals contraband articles in the personal baggage of the performer, and as they pass over the border the customs officials find the secreted articles and place the girl under arrest. The man returns to his home, where he relates his experience. A second attempt to win the young man's love very nearly proves disastrous, and the woman relents and gives herself up to the authorities, who then allow the innocent maiden to return to her home and minister to the wants of her lover. Length, 965 feet.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

George Kleine.

I HAVE LOST TOBY.—An elderly lady is seen to take her pet dog Toby for an afternoon airing. A number of mischievous lads prove very annoying with their attentions to the dog, but madam finally manages to elude them and safely reaches her home with him. When the husband arrives for his evening meal he finds that his spouse is unprepared on account of her attentions to her canine idol. Much aggrieved, he unceremoniously throws the dog out of the window, thus causing his death. Madam is greatly put out about this and her grief knows no bounds. Her interest in dogs is ever apparent and she falls an easy victim to the intrigue of a designing young man with a trick dog. Length, 403 feet.

MR. PALLET GOES OUT LANDSCAPING.—A zealous exponent of the brush and pallet is in search of a number of prize-winning subjects. His first choice of subject is taken from nature, and as he is completing his sketch local residents crowd about the picture in their efforts to inspect it and unfortunately upset and tear the canvas. He is successful in securing the commission to produce an image of a country woman, but misunderstands the instructions and produces the likeness of a burrow being led by the woman, whereupon he is upbraided and his work destroyed. A rabbit is so successfully reproduced that when placed against

THIS TRANSFORMER, KNOWN AS "THE G. E. ECONOMY-ARC" mustof necessity be an invaluable adjunct to any alternating current moving picture installation. THE ADVANTAGES OF A TRANSFORMER FOR THIS WORK WILL BE APPRECIATED by both the theatre management and operator; BY THE MANAGEMENT in the reduction of light bills and in the better production of the pictures due to the steady light obtained, AND BY THE OPERATOR in the simplicity of the device, the absence of danger from shocks,, and the added comfort in the lamp house due to the low heating.

THE SAVING IN POWER INSURED BY THE USE OF A TRANSFORMER INSTEAD OF A RHEOSTAT VARIES FROM 65 to 90 per cent., depending upon the voltage from the supply mains. Many lighting companies require the use of 220 volts for moving picture work in order to avoid heavily loading one side of a three wire system. This increases the loss considerably in circuits using a resistance or reactive device for reducing the voltage.

A brook in a hollow is next chosen as a suitable subject, but the wind is so strong as to blow away his paraphernalia. In disgust he concludes to discard his ambitions for outdoor subjects, betakes himself to his home, where he sets up a study, but fate has apparently determined to undo him and his efforts in this pursuit are equally unavailing. BOOTS AND SADDLES.—A story of army life of the '70's on the frontier when the Indians were dissatisfied with the restraint put upon them by the Government. The opening scene of the picture shows Lieutenant Gray in the mess room of the barracks at his favorite pastime, gambling with some of the troopers who were fortunate enough to have some of their pay still left. He is partly intoxicated and quarrelsome. Lieutenant Bradley enters, and in pursuance of his orders, attempts to put a stop to the game. Gray hates Bradley for his good record and because he is a particular favorite of the colonel and his charming daughter, and the idea of Bradley trying to interfere in his nefarious pastime is gall and wormwood to the rascally lieutenant. Forgettinig his bearing as an officer, Gray attacks Bradley, and being no match for that sturdy young athlete, is receiving a sound drubbing when the colonel appears on the scene. Explanations are offered, but the colonel is obdurate and Gray is placed under arrest and taken to the guard house, where in impotent rage he tears his hair and screams out his hatred against the colonel and Bradley, till exhausted he falls sobbing upon his cot. Finally the day of his court martial arrives and he is brought up for trial. The evidence of his guilt is so strong against him that it takes but a short time to dispose of his case. He receives a dishonorable discharge from the army and is ordered to leave the post before sundown. With disgrace staring him in the face on all sides he leaves the barracks, cursing himself and all who have been instrumental in bringing him to justice. Gradually the full realization of his position dawns upon him and he is half-crazed from remorse and self-pity. At last a desperate plan enters his crazy head. He will compel the colonel to sign a recommendation to the War Department to have him reinstated. Waiting until after dark, he enters the colonel's sitting room, and presenting his petition, on his knees begs him to sign it. Aroused to terrible anger by his impudence, the colonel orders him to leave his house before he is kicked out. In desperation, Gray draws his pistol and threatens the colonel's life. But that old Indian fighter is not frightened by this show of bravado, and by the force of his will, backs the maddened lieutenant out of the room and slams the door in his face. Locking it, he starts to return to his chair, when Gray, who has hastened to the window, fires a shot, seriously wounding the brave old man. With a laugh of fiendish triumph he springs on his waiting horse, and riding rapidly away toward the nearest Indian village, soon disappears in the night. At the fort all is confusion and excitement. Colonel Bennett had been shot by Gray, and Gray had escaped. Bradley was the first to recover his levelheadedness, and ordering out a squad of picked men, starts out to capture the assassin, dead or alive. Gray has made his way to the Indian village in the meantime and is already in friendly confab with the chief, and when he has presented a plentiful supply of firewater, the old chief promises to protect him from his pursuers, and so, feeling safe in his present company, Gray proceeds to drown his sorrows in drink. Guessing the direction that Gray would likely travel in, Bradley and his squad soon reach the village, and dismounting he demands from the chief his knowledge of Gray's whereabouts. Old Red Wing stoutly denies any knowledge of the ex-lieutenant. Bradley orders a search to be made. The Indians are sullen and gather around the little body of soldiers. "Look out, sir," suddenly cries Corporal Casey. "Thim divils air armed." He hardly gets the words out of his mouth, when the chief, picking up a handful of dirt, throws it in the air. In an instant the blankets of the warriors are thrown off, disclosing a rifle in the hands of each Indian. A fusilade of shots ring out, and all but Bradley, Casey and Logan bite the dust. Taken completely by surprise, these three survivors are seized and dragged to the center of the village, where a council is held and their death decided upon. But the boys had one friend in the hostile village, a little Indian maiden, "Deer Foot," who loved the colonel's daughter, and knowing that Bradley was her sweetheart, determined if possible to save him. Stealing away, she makes for the post and arrives a few hours later, nearly exhausted. Gasping out her story, she tells them that no time must be lost if they want to save the captain's life. It only takes a few minutes to get a company of Indian fighters in the saddle, and the race for life began. In the meantime the Indians have held their war dance, and tying their prisoners to the stakes, pile brushwood about them and prepare to enjoy the sight of seeing three of their enemies slowly roasting alive in the flames. Gray, now thoroughly drunk, urges the red devils on, and taunts his old comrades with jeers and boisterous laughter. "Good-bye, sir, and God bless you," says Casey to Bradley as the squaws began to apply the torch. A flame shoots up and crackles about the limbs of the captives, when suddenly a cry of warning from an Indian sentry apprises the savages of danger. What is that rumble of thunder that seems to rise from the valley below? "Thank God," shouts Bradley, "it is our boys." Forgetting their captives for the time, the Indians dash for their rifles, but too late. Down the street of the village, two, three, six, eight, a hundred charging cavalrymen are racing toward the captives bound to the stakes. Rifles began to spit fire as the Indians attempted to make a stand, but in a few seconds the whole village is teeming with charging, slashing, daredevil cavalrymen. So sudden has been the onslaught that not an Indian escapes the fate he so richly deserves. Of course, Bradley and his comrades are rescued, while Gray, who was one of the first to fire upon his former comrades, lies with his face buried in the dust, his lifeless hands clutching the dead grass. A fit end for all traitors who turn against their own blood and race. Length, 1,000 feet.

STORIES OF SOME INDEPENDENT FILMS.

The films of which the following are the stories are handled by the Chicago Film Exchange, the Royal Film Exchange and the Globe Film Exchange:

A PROVIDENTIAL CHANCE.—Bianca, the daughter of a poor cobbler, Giovanni Sarte, is in love with a worthless scoundrel. Her father refuses to allow him to marry her, but, in spite of his objections, her affection cannot be decreased. She determines to elope with her lover. One evening, while Giovanni is not at home, she packs up her belongings and leaves the old life behind, after writing a note to her father, stating her determination. The old man returns, and, after searching for his daughter, finds her note. He is heartbroken. Life has no longer its charms. He goes from bad to worse, and, when the next scene opens, two years later, poor old Giovanni is a habitual drunkard. One evening, Bianca, whose husband has deserted her, abandons her baby, leaving it in a park, and leaving a necklace around its neck. Giovanni, returning from one of his carousals, after having absorbed about as much liquor as possible, finds the child by chance and adopts it, not knowing whom its parents might be. Six years later, Giovanni tells the boy how he had found him, and promises to be a father to him forever. Twenty years later, Bianca, now reduced to beggary, goes into a beautiful house, which, unknown to her, is the residence of her father, who has grown rich. She enters the room where he is seated, and the recognition is mutual. Giovanni refuses to forgive her, and she is about to leave, when the young man enters, wearing the necklace she had put on him years ago. She recognizes it in an instant and clasps her son in her arms. Their combined pleadings soften the old man's heart and she is again a happy member of the family. Length, 696 feet.

A WIDOW TO CONSOLE.—A young widow, who has just recovered from the shock of her bereavement, entertains her new beau in the parlor of her home. The next day, when she is taking the air, a vast number of susceptible men are smitten by her charms. They follow her home and find out her address. She goes out soon after, and entering one by one, they bribe the maid to hide them, thinking to surprise the lady and hoping to win her affections. The maid hides one in the clock, another in the fireplace, a third in the closet, and others in various other places. The lady returns, but before the crowd can make their presence known to her, her beau enters and the woful actions of the multitude of would-be's at what ensues are most comical to behold. Length, 200 feet.

A GOOD EXCUSE.—A gentleman, wishing to go out with the boys, tells his wife that he is sick. He induces a friend to take his place in the bed. His friend is, unfortunately for him, a little shortsighted. The maid brings in a bottle and sets it down near the bed. Our friend, thinking it to be whiskey, drinks the entire contents of the bottle. As he does so, he exposes the label to our view; "Hunyadi Water." His thirst spoils his friend's plan, for, a few hours afterward, his groans attract the attention of the wife, who enters the room and discovers the substitution. She is beating him severely when her husband enters, and he comes in for his share of the beating, too. Length, 200 feet.

THE BURDEN OF DEBT.—The only child of a poor tailor lies ill in bed. They have no money to buy medicine for it, and it rapidly gets worse. One day, a rich banker comes in the store to have a suit of clothes made. The tailor borrows some money from him, giving him a promissory note. Some time afterwards, when the note becomes due, the banker demands payment. The tailor is unable to comply with his request, whereupon the banker makes love to the wife of the tailor. The enraged tailor forcibly ejects the banker from the store. The poor man is deprived of his shop, and gets a job as laborer. He has the misfortune to overturn a wheelbarrow load of bricks upon the foot of a visitor, and is discharged. He tells his wife about his ill-luck and she resolves, unknown to him, to get the money from the sale of their former possessions from the banker. He, in the meantime, has become stricken with remorse, and readily grants her request. She hastens home just in time to save her husband from committing suicide, and all ends well. Length, 704 feet.

PRASCOVIA.—Prascovia, a beautiful Russian girl, is living alone with her father. One day, the old man is arrested by the Russian Police. All of her pleas are in vain; her father is carried off and put to hard labor. One day, as she is walking, she passes the Governor of the Province, his aide and his young son. The latter, while romping about falls down a steep embankment, and is rendered unconscious. Prascovia courageously descends the dangerous declivity and rescues the inanimate boy. The Governor offers, as a token of his gratitude, to grant her any request. Of course she asks for the release of her father. She obtains the Governor's pardon and hastens to the penitentiary. Her father is released and all ends well. Length, 440 feet.

"AND A LITTLE CHILD SHALL LEAD THEM."—This is one of the most pertinent proverbs ever propounded, for the tiny hand of the babe has power to turn the universe. Ever since the foundation of the world has the little child been the ruling potentiality. The child has stimulated our every action, spiritual and actual, since the night at Bethlehem. The house divided against itself has been united by the child, as was the case in this story. The death of the first born, at the age of two, left the couple almost inconsolable, and the little toy dog, which the baby held in its arms, in its last moments, was indeed a cherished remembrance. Seven years after the husband became so deeply engrossed in his business affairs as to neglect to some extent his wife and second child, a girl of six. The wife complaining of his indifference, a quarrel ensues. She decides to leave him. Arrangements for a separation are made, and a division of effects takes place. Everything is disposed of when the little girl picks up the toy dog of her dead and gone brother, and says, "Mamma, who takes this?" Well the scene that transpires defies description and it is sufficient to say that it is the most touching episode ever portrayed. The separation does not take place. 340 feet.

A BURGLAR'S MISTAKE.—A thrilling story of an attempt at blackmail. How many of us are wont to look back and wish that we might blot out from our memory the ever recurring specter of the follies of our youth. Such was the experience of Henry J. Newman, a wealthy banker, who, in the flippant Spring of his life was guilty of a slight indiscretion which now in the sober Autumn of his existence seems so iniquitous that he fain would forget it, and above all keep it from knowledge of his family, not that it was enormous, for it was not, as Newman was a man whose standard of morals was high. However, this one false step was known of by Dick Folson, an unconscionable wretch, who, knowing Newman's sensitive nature, sees in the episode an elegant chance for graft—or rather blackmail, which he proceeds to take advantage of. He writes a letter to Newman telling him he has convincing proofs of the affair and asking if it is worth to him $300 a month to keep mum? If not Mrs. Newman will be apprised of all. The letter arrives at a most opportune time to lend success to Folson's design, for Newman is surrounded by his little family, enjoying to the extreme mellifluous domesticity. He goes to his office and sends an answer to Folson saying that his demand is unreasonable and begging him to have pity. Folson writes an answer, but on second thought goes to Newman's office himself and to Newman's entreaties simply replies that it is either $300 a month—the first payment at once—or he will expose him to his wife. Newman at length yields and Folson goes away satisfied for the month at least. The money does not last long under the strain of Folson's dissipations and a week later finds him broke again. In this condition he is visited by one of his companions, who is setting out on a burglaring expedition and wants his assistance. In his present frame of mind he is ready for anything, and so readily consents, not even bothering to inquire where the job is to be pulled off. Arriving at the house they effect an entrance, and get to work gathering up the articles of value. It is not long before they are surprised by someone coming, and start to beat a hasty retreat. One of them gets out, but Folson stumbles and falls and the man of the house is on him, with revolver in hand. Folson scrambles to his feet and finds himself face to face with Newman. For a moment he feels easy, as he assumes he is safe, but the awful reality dawns on him when Newman tells him he can now without compunction put him out of the way forever, for is he not a burglar? And is it not perfectly reasonable for him to shoot him as such? Well you may be sure that Newman does not let slip this opportunity of assuring himself and his family peace of mind from now on, so when the police carry off the inanimate form of the intruder. Length, 959 feet.

THE DECEPTION.—Of all the agonies of life, that which is most harrowing is the conviction that we have been deceived where we placed all the trust of love, and this is most apparent to Harry Colton, a young artist in the action of his

THE PRESIDENTIAL INAUGURATION FILM

It's Independent, too, and Positively the Only Perfect and Officially Recognized Film of the Great Presidential Inauguration

Expert Chicago exhibitors pronounce it to be the best film, photographically, of any great event ever seen. The pictures taken by the "license" combine, are not to be compared in any way to this film. It is one hundred per cent. better and you'll say the same after seeing both. It ought to be. The Independents paid big money to secure special privileges which others could not obtain, and that accounts for our having this, the only successful film of the great event, and mind you it is independent and can be had only through Independent exchanges. Insist upon getting the Independent Film only.

It's Great Help to the Independent Cause

And proof that independent films are unexcelled, a fact that the public in general now accedes. People everywhere will flock to see it, and exhibitors showing it will have the biggest attraction of the season. Therefore, be the first in your locality to exhibit it, and get the bulk of the money those in your community will spend to see it. The complete set of pictures consist of about two thousand feet, is put up in one or two reels, to meet your requirements. Order it through any independent exchange. Live exchanges should wire their order now. Price 12c per foot.

Don't Sign Anything Now By Any Means

It means everything to you, not to sign anything at this time. Why should you, when you can exhibit both Independent and licensed films. But if you sign any kind of a contract whatever, you will have to exhibit "licensed" films only for one year, and you cannot show any of our new Independent subjects, which are proving such big attractions, and profit makers for exhibitors. It is no longer a matter of being unable to secure films. You can get all you want. It is a question of dollars and cents, and you certainly will make more money, if you can exhibit any film you desire, because you can select only those that are the best attractions.

wife, Mabel. It has been an ardous struggle for fame with poor Harry and when poverty's wolf is growling at their threshold he resolves to go out and seek employment which may not be as congenial as art, but will prove decidedly more remunerative. But his wife will not allow it. She pleads with him to hope on, work at his painting while she goes to seek a position as teacher of piano at the Conservatory. His ambitious spirit is compelling and he allows her to go. Piano lessons, indeed. The brave girl gets a job in the laundry at the washtubs. However, she has grit and with her first day's pay—one dollar—she drags her sore body homeward, stopping on the way to buy a few provisions. Dauntless she goes the next day to give "piano lessons," at the washboard, and while away an art collector calls on Colton and purchases his masterpiece for a goodly sum, with a promise of more purchases to come. His joy is boundless and he cannot wait until evening to tell Mabel the good news, so he rushes to the Conservatory, and, of course, does not find her. She has never been there; they don't know her. He stands for a moment paralyzed. "My God! she has been deceiving me. I shall cast her off for ever." And rushing home he is writing a farewell note, when the door opens and poor Mabel is carried in a sorry sight to behold. She had fallen into one of the tubs of boiling suds and her arms are scalded from hands to shoulders. Harry, when he realizes the awful sacrifice of the girl, and all for him, is about to gather her in his arms, but she cries with pain, and he can only kiss the tip of her finger. The subject is a beautiful story of a woman's self-sacrificing love. Length, 653 feet.

FILM RENTERS

We wish to announce to you that from this date all Swanson offices will be pleased to rent you Film, no matter whether or not you have paid the machine license required by the Patents Company and their licensees. Because of the interest Mr. Swanson personally has taken in the existing conditions of the Moving Picture business and the strong opposition he has made against the compelling of payment by the exhibitors, of the Two Dollar weekly royalty imposed by the Patents Company, and his interest in and loyalty to his customers, together with his refusal to advise them to take a step which he did not believe was for their well being, will, we believe, lead to our becoming

Independent

Mr. Swanson has considered the question most carefully and has investigated very thoroughly the source of supply of Film for the Independent Exchanges, and he believes that the subjects which are to be placed on the market by the International Projecting & Producing Company are unequaled, not only in subject matter, but also in photography, and will be the choicest productions of the European manufacturers. We ask that all exhibitors who are interested in securing the highest class of Film Service write us today for full particulars.

PREVENTS TIRED EYES AND HEADACHES

The rapidity of our new shutter has been so perfected that 30 to 40 per cent. less non-exposure (which has heretofore caused the tremulous vibration producing so many tired eyes and headaches) is found in the Motiograph than in any other machine, making perfect brilliancy of picture and sharpness of outline. Together with the rocklike steadiness of the pedestal the flicker is thus entirely eliminated.

Five-cent Theatre and Vaudeville-House Managers increase their bank account with the Motiograph. Patrons who come once will always come again where they know they see the best pictures, positively rest their eyes instead of tiring them, and where all fire risks are removed.

The Motiograph

1908 Theatre Model, Especially Approved by the Underwriters Association

OTHER POINTS OF EXCELLENCE IN THE MOTIOGRAPH found in no other machines are: A special Film Rewind by which the film can be rewound with the main crank in two minutes without removing either reels or magazines, saving time between pictures and entertainments; perfected Fireproof Magazines, Fire Traps, with four rollers and with suring actuated flanged guides, preventing side movement and making it impossible for fire to pass them; never failing Automatic Fireproof Shutters; Perfect Framing Device; Flanged Sprocket Rollers to prevent film being torn or ruined by accidentally running off sprocket wheels; Enclosed Gears and working parts; Perfect Take-up with new form of belt adjuster; Lid Off Wide Open Lamp House making it easily accessible; Improved Arc Lamp with all Hand Wheel Adjustments; Slide Carrier Swing, saving one-third more illustration for the Motion Pictures.

A Drunkard's Reformation

The most powerful temperance lecture ever depicted

There is not the slightest question that in this subject the Biograph has produced the most powerful motion picture ever made. No stronger nor intensely moral sermon has ever been given; the superb acting bringing out the psychological importance so clearly that we may well say that "actions speak louder than words." In the beginning we see a young married man, the husband of a trusting wife, and father of a pretty child, through association just starting on the downward path. His little one (who proves to be his ministering angel) persuades him to take her to the theatre. The play happens to be a dramatization of Emile Zola's L'Assommoir, "Drink". Here he sees the awful result of intemperance and resolves to abstain from intoxicants for the rest of his life. The subject is beautifully staged, and the photographic quality perfect. The theatre scenes are most novel.

Editorial.

A statement issued by the Motion Picture Patents Company confirms what has been said before, but which has been more or less discredited, that their policy and aim is to uplift the moving picture business. To accomplish this it seems that their forces are arrayed against the showman who runs an undesirable place. Not necessarily the man who runs a small place, but the small man who runs his show so that it comes under the ban of the municipal authorities. As long as no unjust methods are adopted to carry out this plan of reform no one can cavil at their policy, especially while their pruning methods are confined to the exhibitors of their own licensed films.

We have it direct from the President of the International Projecting and Producing Company that they also will work along the same lines, and through their exchanges, endeavor to elevate the business to a higher standard. It would therefore seem that these competing forces are not fighting against each other so much as against the undesirable element that has brought the business into the limelight of public opprobrium. This looks well and sounds well, and the Moving Picture World is with them, side by side.

Twelve subjects, aggregating about 6,000 feet, were released by the International Projecting and Producing Company on Monday. They had ample supply on hand to meet any demand, but the independent exchanges are not buying as rapidly as they are talking. Their demand for American subjects will, in another week, be also put to the test, as two factories in this vicinity have got busy and we are assured that three, and possibly four, American subjects will be regularly supplied from now on.

With this plentiful supply, and competition on the basis of quality, we look forward to an impetus in the moving picture field that will place it on the highest pinnacle of the amusement world. The popular show for the people, and, under the rigid censorship now being enforced, the best amusement for the public.

To the Manufacturers.

Monday last, March 22, was the release day of a great number of reels of Independent film subjects from Europe, which are now being shown, and successfully shown, in the moving picture theaters of the United States. More subjects are on their way. They are, we learn, in constant demand from day to day, and the result is that the moving picture theaters of the United States are largely supplied with pabulum of foreign manufacture.

Commenting upon the outbreak of the Independent movement a few weeks ago, we pointed out that the battle which had started would be one of quality. Morals, ethics and commercial principles have nothing to do with the matter. The ordinary patron of a moving picture theater is supremely indifferent as to whether the picture he looks at is a "trust" product or an Independent product. All he wants is his money's worth. If he gets that he is satisfied, and goes again.

We refrained from committing ourselves to any opinion as to the qualities of these imported pictures before seeing them, not once, but often. We have seen them, and common honesty obliges us to say that in respect of photographic and other qualities they are, at least, the equal of the American product; in fact, it is a moot point whether they are not better. The associated manufacturers, in fact, are face to face with the very severest form of competition—namely, superiority of product. This we say after much deliberation. On purely patriotic grounds we should like to feel otherwise, and so indeed we hope to do before long.

Meanwhile the position of the American film manufacturer is perhaps not all that could be desired. Rumor has it that his market is limited, whereas aforetime it was unlimited. Now comes the imported product in keen competition. The situation is poignant and fraught with much speculation. We have never undervalued the position or strength of the Independent movement as affecting the film market, and from the fact, published in our last issue, that the duty on films is not to be raised unless the Government is successful in its proposed appeal, it certainly looks as if the film importers hold a very strong hand. They have only to continue their campaign as successfully as they appear to have commenced it to make good all their claims. Whether they will remains to be seen.

There is, therefore, one lesson which we hope will not be lost upon the American manufacturers—namely, that they have entered on a real battle of quality. There is no sentiment about this matter. The continental European manufacturers are ahead of their American competitors at all points of the game. We know this from actual personal experience and observation of the working conditions. There is probably no moving picture factory in the United States of America so well equipped, technically and otherwise, as several foreign factories that we know of. This fact admits of no dispute at all. It is proved by the quality of the pictures turned out. We conclude this article, which is written in the best interests of American manufacturers, by quoting from the Moving Picture World of February 13, "Captital is not everything in the moving picture field where a severe competition of quality has set in. Quality, gents, I repeat."

The Modern Way in Moving Picture Making.

By Thomas Bedding, F. R. P. S.

CHAPTER III.

The Studio.

Ample stage room in moving picture making is a sine qua non for many reasons: first of all there must be space for the handling of crowds of persons. Not all moving picture plays are restricted to three or four characters. Popular dramas and similar works require the co-operation of many characters, with the necessary space for controlling them. The moving picture manufacturer, therefore, is wise in giving himself plenty of elbow-room. There are some films now before the public which show 60 or 70 persons, not to mention horses and vehicles, etc., on the stage at one time. So it is obvious that the producer needs ample stage accommodation some time or other. Anybody familiar with the making of moving pictures can see that some of the American manufacturers are restricted in the choice of subject by exiguity of stage space. Their plays are produced in very shallow rooms, and so the scope for dramatic action is limited. It would be invidious to name names, but those at whom this criticism is pointed should take the hint, if they want to be in the forefront of progress. The public is well educated up to the matter. An important question to decide is, whether the stage should be indoors or outdoors. Most of the best work produced at the present time is made in the open air, for there you get naturalness of lighting coupled with naturalness of grouping. Such conditions, however, are not always obtainable. Pathe and the Kalem Company are noted for the excellence of their outdoor work, and their example is one to be followed if possible. Pictorial photography of the stationary kind is best done en plein air, as photographers know, and the same rule should hold good with regard to moving pictures. Climatic uncertainties, however, make outdoor moving picture photography something of a luxury. The daily routine of work is best done in a studio. And here we are brought face to face with the question, Which is the best kind of light to work by? Natural light admitted through a glass roof, or artificial light obtained by electric current?

The latter, of course, has its advantages. You can get a steady, constant light of any amount of candle power, thus making you independent of daylight altogether. You can shorten your exposures as much as you wish; you can get numerous variations of stage lighting, and can approximate your effects to those obtained by daylight. I say approximate advisedly. Artificial light photography can be made to so closely resemble daylight work that only experience can detect the difference; but there is a difference, and it is perceptible in the enlarged pictures, which have a certain harshness and unreality of illumination, due to the fact that the light is thrown on the stage from many sources, instead of as in natural light proceeding from a common source, and therefore following certain clear rules as to the disposition of shadow, half-tone, highlight, etc. There is another thing to be considered, and that is the very great expense of using a large volume of artificial light. Current is costly. Daylight, when you get it is inexpensive. Moreover, the current varies in intensity, and so must the exposure. Another feature of the matter is that, spectroscopically, artificial light differs from daylight. consequently the element of color asserts itself. A perfect substitute for daylight has to be discovered, although therectically it seems easy enough to make an artificial spectrum exactly corresponding, ray for ray, to the solar spectrum.

It is not necessary, perhaps, to press this point to its utmost limits, but it may be taken as axiomatic on the grounds stated—that a daylight studio is the best for all around work in moving picture making. I am aware that at the present time several new moving picture plants are being projected, and it will be well, therefore, if those responsible for their construction and equipment would bear these facts in mind. I know of one large factory which depends for its light on electricity. It is costly, and it is inefficient. For a fraction of the expense which this installation entailed, a glass roof studio could have been erected on the top of the building, and, besides saving money, much more satisfactory results would have been made. In all this I am keeping in view the photographic quality of the picture, its proper and natural lighting, its modelling, freedom from shadows and truth of tone rendering. In other words, I am putting it up to the manufacturers to pay a little closer attention to the photography of the subject in accordance with established theory and practice. There is, after all, only a difference of degree. A good studio portrait or group and a good series of the same subject, which is, after all, what your moving picture is, nothing more nor less then the same. In many moving picture factories it is the photographic end which receives the scantiest attention, being more often than not left in the hands of ignorant empirics, who have failed to make good as professional photographers.

Topical or occasional work need not be considered in this chapter, because the operator must make the best of his opportunity—whether it be a Presidential Inauguration in a March blizzard or the home-coming of the Pacific fleet off the coast of Virginia. This kind of thing belongs to the accidental moving picture work Failing an open-air studio in Arcadia, "where it is always afternoon" and the characters can be handled just as Shakespeare handles his characters in the Forest of Arden (as shown in his play, "As You Like It"), the ambitious maker of moving picture films is urged to do the work under the glass roof. Plenty of space; plenty of glass built on the lean-to principal; plenty of light; plenty of reflectros; plenty of blinds for shutting off the superfluous light controlling the shadows, and here you have in a simple form a specification for the kind of studio in which moving picture work is best done. On the other hand it is advantageous to have command of the electric light as well, for producing interior effects at night time. The ideal combination of lights is daylight and electricity, either being usable at discretion. The greater part of the work, however, will probably be done by the former; but the latter is always handy. Some successful daylight studios are built away from cities, and so the highest actinic value of the light is obtainable. This is of importance, as there is a great deal of smoke and haze around the town, which lessens the value of the light.

One of our theatrical contemporaries which "purports to cover moving picture news" is not conspicuous for a sense of humor. Apropos our remark that we "awaited developments and results" of the suggested investigation of the moving picture "trust" we are oracularly twitted with gravity. Be that as it may, we shall go on waiting and so, we imagine, will our self-constituted critic, gravely or not, as he chooses to do.

OBSERVATIONS BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

Special pains were taken during the past week to watch developments, actions and fluctuations in the field of nickelodeons and other users of moving pictures, and I am obliged to admit that never in the history of that line of business has there been manifested more feeling of uncertainty, discontent and ill-humor than is shown at present. This is the case both in the ranks of the Licensed and Independent people. The complaints made by the former are many and varied. The latter complain chiefly of the slowness with which the loudly proclaimed relief is being brought into play. "It is all very well," they say, "to warn us against the trust and paint in brilliant hues a picture of freedom and independence, but we need film subjects."

In the matter of sentiment, the Independents are in the lead this week by many miles. All will admit that, by a great majority, the exhibitors are of, or come from, the people who are bitterly opposed to arbitrary measures in any form, and nothing under the great heavens is more distasteful to them than to be placed in a position where they must feel that they are being whipped into line.

Almost eight weeks have elapsed and, notwithstanding a stupendous force of lawyers and minor employees have been in the harness, the Motion Picture Patents Company has apparently made as little progress in behalf of its constituents as the Independents have. In this respect it stands horse and horse as to both factions.

Some time has elapsed since the press agents heralded the arrival in this country of the cream, head and brains of the European manufacturers, who were to crush the American octopus, but the principal fruits of the arrivals and subsequent mass meetings have been promises. Exhibitors have been going over to the Licensed side daily, because there were not sufficient Independent subjects on the market. The Independents realized this and have, within the past few days, reiterated their assurances and released some subjects. There is no bitterness of feeling towards the Independents on the part of the exhibitors; on the contrary, the feeling is quite the reverse, and should the Independents at this time, or in the near future, be able to release the quantity and quality of subjects required it is dollars to doughnuts that there would be a tremendous falling off in the business of the licensed film renting exchanges. There is no bias or guesswork about this. It is a plain statement based upon facts.

It should not be inferred from this that the exhibitors prefer the subjects of the independent concerns to the others. Such is not the case. But the feeling of the exhibitors is most bitter against the Patents company and its methods, and those who are abiding by them are only doing so until such time as they find the independent supply of films will be adequate for the demand. When this point is reached look out for jumps. The statement that American subjects must be used has no weight with the dissatisfied exhibitors. The Independents have already assured them that there are millions of feet of American subjects available. They are subjects which were bought and paid for before the Patents company was organized, and which can be used without fear of replevin or any other proceedings.

When the Patents company first started business the exhibitors jumped up in arms against the payment of the license fee exacted. Upon reflection, and assurances that they were not obliged to bind themselves to the Patents company, these exhibitors concluded to pay the license fees and await developments. But a small percentage of the exhibitors have failed to take out licenses up to April 1. Judging from the prevailing sentiment the percentage will be greatly increased between now and April 12, by which time the exhibitor must pay his license fee to May 1, or have his service cut off.

It is quite natural to ask why a radical change is looked for by April 12. This is the explanation given by many exhibitors: The Patents people are arbitrary; exhibitors are not treated as business men, but as dependents; the exhibitors get no protection under their licenses. One exhibitor puts the situation in this light: "As a collection agency I think the Motion Picture Patents Company is a grand success. It has the electric power companies beaten to a frazzle. Its one great aim is to get in the $2 per week, and it scores every time. When I finally decided to 'can' my pride and take out a license I confidently expected that I would get some benefit under it, but twist the situation as I will I can see nothing gained. Yes, it's true that by having the license I have been spared a visit from a deputy sheriff and a half dozen lawyers, but there is a fellow not very far from my place who has not paid $2 a week and is getting all kinds of films."

It was suggested to this exhibitor that the Patents company was hard at work carrying out its plans and had replevined films from a number of places throughout the country.

"Yes," exclaimed he, with a display of some temper, "what good is that doing the exhibitor?"

"Why, that competitor learns that he cannot run licensed films," was the answer.

"Oh, piffle! He learns that he cannot run licensed films without a license, that's all. What good does that do me? He goes to the Patents company, pledges loyalty, pays his $2, and is just as good a man as I am. The only people who benefit by the replevin proceedings are the Patents company and the film renters. One gets $2 more a week and the film renter gets another customer. The exhibitor gets another licensed competitor. I claim it is a selfish system and one that must eventually drive the exhibitors into the Independent ranks. If it were not for the exhibitors, the film renters would get no money, and if it were not for the film renters the manufacturers would not be making so many films. Such being the case it is but natural to expect that the Patents company, which represents the manufacturers should give the exhibitors some consideration. The great trouble is that there are too many lawyers in the Patents company and not enough people with a knowledge of the exhibiting business. A lot of printed matter is issued every week and a good deal is said about the license fee being returned in case the application for license being rejected, but I have not heard of a license being refused. Take it from me, any fee those lawyers get hold of has as much chance of getting back as I have of getting John D.'s millions."

Another exxhibitor had this to say: "That Patents company business is certainly a great game. I don't see what they are going to do with all the money. I can tell them what they could do with some of it, and if they would do it much of the feeling against them would be wiped out Here we exxhibitors are working night and day and spending our good money to place on the statute books laws that will protect the moving picture business. This work is as much for the benefit of the Patents company as for ourselves, and I don't see why they should not give us a little. They would not miss a contribution to our funds from the immense amount of easy money that is flowing into their coffers, and by loosening up a little in this respect they would show the exhibitors that they really desired to do something in their behalf."

Still another exhibitor said: "I'll continue paying the license fee to the Patents company until such time as I see my way clear to get good service elsewhere, and there are many others like me. It is worth $2 a week to me to stand in with them now. I have the right to surrender my license when I please, and I'll do it just as soon as I find I can get films to meet my requirements. I am not a Socialist or an anarchist; I don't wish to become known as a howler against trusts; I believe they are what some people call a necessary evil in many instances; but I don't like some of the methods of the Patents company. As an exhibitor, I cannot see why the company was created, unless it was to squeeze us."

The independent film renter is scouting like mad for second-hand films. This is proof enough that the average independent does not intend to become a regular purchaser of the regular weekly output of the independent manufacturer, but intends to buy only when it suits him. This tendency in itself means failure for any concerted independent movement, and the Moving Pictures Patents Company knows this and therefore they can afford to smile at the grandiloquent promises made by the Independents and the fierce threats made against the trust. The simple, solid truth is that the vast number of exchanges that claim to be independent are running on the mangiest of junk and the outcry of their subscribers is painful. Already the business of many independent shows has been ruined and some of them are closing their doors.

OLIVER.

TALKING PICTURES: THE GAUMONT CHRONOPHONE, C.

The talking photograph is the photograph of the future. We have long had motion shown on the screen, and the demand for vocalised motion is so strong that many enterprising inventors have been employing their brains for the purpose of perfecting the union of the phonograph and the photograph. By and by the pictures will not only talk, but will be shown in their natural colors; that, however, as Kipling says, "is another story." All that we are concerned about at this moment is to apprise manufacturers, renters and exhibitors that the talking photograph is a present factor in the entertainment situation, and that it has to be dealt with at once.

Last week we printed a very able article on the subject, from the theoretical aspect, by Mr. Carl Herbert; a fortnight ago we reviewed a useful synchronising device, the "Cinephone"; and we have other information on the subject to give our readers at an early date. All this, as we have said, makes for the accomplishment of a revolution which has distinctly started.

It is five years almost to the present day since we saw in London the first Gaumont Chronophone; our impression then was that excellent synchronism of phonograph and photograph was obtained. Since that date we have seen other methods, but none of them approach in completeness and effectiveness that which we examined last week at the Gaumont Chronophone place on East Twenty-fifth street, New York. We were courteously given the opportunity of enjoying a special entertainment, so we used all our ears and all our eyes, with the result that we were enabled to see for ourselves that in the Gaumont Chronophone the synchronism of sound and motion is absolutely perfect. In brief, the action is suited to the word all the time. If this be always done in talking pictures, then the long-felt public want will have been satisfied.

The Gaumont Chronophone displayed some most atractive subjects, to wit: songs and dances: just the kind of thing taken in rapid time to please a popular audience. We understand that at their Broadway studio and in the new Gaumont building to be erected on Long Island, a list of many hundreds of American dramas, comedies, duologues, songs, dances and the like is in preparation. Chronophone C is already popular in very large theaters throughout the United States, and the demand is greater than the supply. The up-to-date exhibitor can hardly afford to ignore the entertainment possibilities of this marvelous instrument, which, as we have already remarked, works perfectly and without a hitch.

To briefly describe it, the Chronophone Model C consists of two parts, the projecting apparatus and the talking apparatus, connected by a multiple cable joining the synchronizing parts. The picture machine has a cam which neither wears, scratches, nor breaks the film. This system suppresses the star-wheel and intermittently moving sprocket. The Chrono has automatic safety light cut-off, fireproof film boxes, fly-wheel, lens for the projection of slides, and rapidly rotating shutter that does away with flicker. To the Chrono is attached the automatic synchroniser. A multiple cable is attached to this which connects up with the synchroniser on the talking machine, thus assuring an automatic synchronism between the two. Below the baseboard is fixed an electric motor, which allows the operator to have free use of his hands to regulate the light or to cut it off quickly in case of a break in the film or other accident. The synchroniser serves the double purpose of keeping the two machines in synchronism, in which case a needle on the dial does not move, and also if by any chance a piece should get cut out of the film, say four images, by placing the needle four divisions to the left on the dial these four images are automatically caught up and the synchronism is again made perfect.

The talking machine outfit consists of two talking machines, each having the Gaumont synchronising distributor, connected up together, both working in synchronism with the picture machine. They can be used consecutively for the projection of continuous pictures up to 1,500 feet long without a stop, or each one can be used separately, independently of the other, so that a total breakdown is impossible. The multiple cable coming from the synchroniser in the projecting machine connects with either of the combs placed for its reception. On the baseboard is placed a double pole switch for changing from one machine to the other and an amepere meter to enable the correct working of the machine to be tested. The synchronism can be obtained either by direct or alternating current of 110 volts, or it can be obtained by 10 or 12 volt batteries. The outfit also includes a pair of telephones for communication between the projecting room and behind the screen.

The acoustic properties of the hall in which the Chronophone C is used necessarily influence, to some extent, the volume and quality of the sound emitted by the phonograph, but we believe, generally speaking, it is successful in both large and small places. These are circumstances, however, by which the exhibitor himself must be guided. We recommend all our exhibiting readers to get acquainted with Chronophone C, which they can do by calling and examining the instrument at the Gaumont Company's place on East Twenty-fifth street, New York City.

Hooray! The censors are getting busy. Now, Sadie, lengthen that skirt of yours; and you, Mamie, cover up those creamy arms and your neck a bit more, my dear. Otherwise you'll lose your jobs, darlings. You, too, Messieurs Pathe, please to understand that the American interpretation of the decalogue is more rigid than the French. Holy Moses, shan't we all be good in Moving Picturedom before long! Good as good; and gooder. Seriously, I hope the censorship will act beneficially, but I hope and pray it won't lead to dullness and dryness.

For we do NOT want education, edification, instruction, information, in a moving picture theater. We want ENTERTAINMENT AND AMUSEMENT. The moving picture theater is neither a church nor a school. There is no lack of those about already, and the former, especially, would be better patronized if the conductors of them properly attended to their business. And their business is with our souls, not with our recreations. The world would be a mighty dull place if it was all work and no play. The proverb says that sort of thing makes Jack a dull boy. So it does.

But censorship of motion picture morality and ethics however efficiently carried out will not take us far on the uplift journey that all are so anxious to make. And, oh, my, how very anxious we all seem to be, to be sure! No, there is an even more important censorship to be organized and carried out. When you have eliminated indecency, obscenity, brutality, criminality, mawkishness, and "general unsuitability" of subject, the real battle has to be fought and won. I mean the battle of QUALITY. Aye, there's the rub, gents.

For it is by quality that the moving picture of to-morrow will have to stand or fall. It is along those lines that competition has set in. A man of very ordinary intellect and ability can make a passably good moving picture which will be tolerated or endured in a Nickelodeon. That sore of thing is being done at this moment and people are tolerating and enduring the goods. They have to; there is nothing else, or not much else, to be had—AT PRESENT.

But better times are surely at hand. The critical writers in the theatrical papers are saying unkind things about the silent plays and their producers. They are often plotless concoctions badly staged. They begin nowhere, and they finish in the same place. If you doubt me read The Dramatic Mirror and similar publications. Week by week they accuse moving picture producers of ignorance, ineptitude, and plagiarism. No business conducted on such lines can hope permanently to thrive and prosper. Its only hope lies in its intrinsic good qualities.

Good writers, scenic artists, producers, and photographers are vital to the production of good moving photographs. Have we got them? An answer to this question lies buried in the criticisms that are printed weekly in this and other journals. Ten dollars WON'T, CAN'T buy a good moving picture play—nor even a good idea, sketch, or scenario. People can dispose of their brainwork at more profitable rates. They can make more money out of starting a new religion, or peddling. Far easier work than "writing for the stage."

Now this is only touching upon the fringe of a vital question. There probably isn't a moving picture plant in America to-day which would not pay for completely overhauling and modernizing, systematising, and reforming. Why are the European manufacturers admittedly ahead of their American competitors? They are more systematic, scientific, and thorough in the work. The American manufacturer is in too much of a hurry to get out the goods to pay attention to the quality of them. But he must. It is QUALITY, QUALITY, QUALITY only that will enable him to meet and compete with foreign competition on a low tariff. Quality all the time! Here endeth this week's lesson.

CINEMATOGRAPHY ON RAILROAD CARS.

An engineer of Florence, Italy, has taken out a patent for the installation of moving pictures on railroad cars and a company has been formed to put this invention in practical use. The traveler would then see on a screen in the car the different views, buildings, monuments, art treasures, etc., of the different countries they were passing through; also the different local industries. It is easy to understand that it would be a powerful advertising scheme.—From the "Phono-Cine Gazette."

MODERN ART IN MOTION PICTURES.

Talking with a gentleman who is well known to New York theater-goers, whom we met in Keith's "Bijou Dream," we asked his opinion of the dramatic talent displayed in motion pictures.

"Really, it is wonderful," he said, "how clearly these plots can be worked out on the screen. I never would have believed that I could have been so impressed with a dumb show. These Biograph pictures, for example, 'The Deception' and 'A Little Child Shall Lead Them,' are samples of dramatic construction and acting such as one might expect to see in any of the great Broadway theaters. Every movement and every pause is so suggestive that one cannot help but feel the emotions and almost imagine he hears the words. And the photography is so cleverly done that one forgets it is a mere photograph and not the real thing. Yes, this is art."

Coming from a man of long experience on the stage, these words should be of great encouragement to all film manufacturers, and especially the Biograph Company, whose productions have so steadily and surely forged ahead that they are being eagerly sought for by the exhibitor and the public.

THE KINEMACOLOR PROCESS IN "NATURAL COLORS."

An American is said, by the London Daily Mail, to have offered $250,000 for the United States rights of the Kinemacolor process of making moving pictures in natural colors. According to a criticism of the process published in The Moving Picture World of January 9th last, its value is greater in London than it is in New York, where it is nil. Writing on the subject in a London contemporary, F. Martin Duncan, F.R.P.S., an authority, says:

"Mr. Smith deserves the congratulations and good wishes of all who are interested in the advancement of the bioscope, for his extremely ingenious process undoubtedly marks an important step in advance towards the long desired and still unrealized production of motion pictures in the true colors of Nature. That Mr. Smith himself frankly admits the present incompleteness of his process, is to my mind one of the most favorable signs that his labors may ultimately be crowned with success. One of the most fruitful causes of retarded progress towards perfection in the production of the motion picture has been the blatant self-satisfaction of the manufacturer if he has succeeded in making the slightest improvement in the mechanism of the bioscope, and his utter or wilful inability to realize that his effort is but an improvement, or step forward, but not the ultimate perfection."

CENSORS NEEDED FOR TALKING PLAYS.

The following is the New York World's Poll of Salacious Plays. Will Canon Chase and the People's Institute kindly get busy?

"The Queen of the Moulin Rouge"—Tawdry, disgusting, vile.

"The Girl from Rector's"—Beneath criticism and beyond contempt.

"The Blue Mouse"—Directly immoral in gilding and making light of vice.

"Miss Innocence"—Near-nude and sensual, craftily designed to appeal to vulgar, callow, animal desire.

"The Easiest Way"—Indirectly immoral, depicting vice only in its most repulsive aspects—depressing and degrading.

"Kassa"—An attempt to arouse false sympathy for an immoral passion.

MOVING PICTURES ARE DRAMATIC WORKS.

Author's Copyright Privilege Maintained—Important Decision by Court of Appeals.

By a decision recently rendered in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, a moving picture exhxibition is held to be a stage representation violating the rights of the author's copyrighted book.

The question arose in a suit brought by Klaw & Erlanger and Harper & Brothers against the Kalem Company, to enjoin the moving picture exhibitions of "Ben-Hur." The Kalem Company admitted that the scenes which were being exhibited were taken from General Lew Wallace's book, "Ben-Hur," but it urged, through its counsel, Drury W. Cooper, that the representation was only an exhibition of pictures and not a dramatic performance under the copyright law, and that in any event the statute was unconstitutional which sought to prevent moving pictures, because it was not a "writing," within the meaning of the constitution which vested in Congress the power to secure to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their "writings."

Klaw & Erlanger and Harper & Brothers were represented by John Larkin and David Gerber, and it was shown that over fire hundred different theatoriums were giving exhibitions of "Ben-Hur" throughout the country, and while they conceded that the questions presented had never been decided in this country, because the moving picture was a matter of recent discovery and development, still as an author was protected in the story which he originated, any method of conveying to the public that story, whether in pantomime, dialogue or by means of moving pictures, was a violation of the author's exclusive right to his origination. The Circuit Court of Appeals held that in order to give a moving picture exhibition it was necessary to take the novel of the author and prepare a synopsis or story, which was in effect a dramatization, and that the author alone had the right to make or authorize a dramatization, and that therefore a moving picture exhibition of a story of an author violated the author's exclusive right secured to him by his copyright.

THE MARSHAW SLIDE COMPANY.

We have received several complaints to publish the fact that this concern does not deliver the goods or answer letters and asked them for an explanation. This comes to hand in the shape of a long letter from Mr. Marshaw, in which he says that orders so swamped them in their first quarters that they have been busy moving to a new building, where they will have the necessary room to satisfactorily handle all business and give prompt attention to correspondence. The time consumed in moving and fitting up the new quarters has unavoidably resulted in neglect of some of their customers, for which they desire to publicly express their regret and promise to make amends. Guy A. Eaton, C. H. Mitchell, W. F. Keefe, E. A. Nelson and others please notice.

MANUFACTURERS, EXCHANGES, EXHIBITORS.

Gentlemen—As I am greatly interested in Cinematography I wrote a series of letters for the Moving Picture World on my trips amongst the country exhibitors, in which letters I condemned so-called vaudeville.

There is no need to tell you, gentlemen, that some unscrupulous showmen are doing their best to put out of existence a lot of small places by giving extraordinary programs. When the business will be in the hands of only a few big houses the output of films will be greatly reduced and these greedy folks will be in a position to dictate to the manufacturers. The manufacturers will be pushed to the wall, they will have to accept the prices offered them. The renters will be put out of existence and numerous small show places will be ruined.

A small country show place with an average seating capacity of 200 chairs and only four hours of work, from 7 to 11 P. M., with practically no matinee and no Sunday work, should be able to give four shows per evening, to have a daily receipt of $40 or $240 weekly.

With competition like that of the State Street Theater of Trenton, giving a two-and-a-half-hour show, these little showmen will not be able to give more than two shows per evening and consequently reduce their receipts to $120 per week. Now, after deducting the rent, the current, the lights, the film service, the operator's and employees' and other expenses, I do not see how the exhibitor can make enough to pay his own board.

Moving pictures should be shown alone and the vaudeville should be restored to the stage proper. Moving picture folks should not conflict with the theatrical managers.

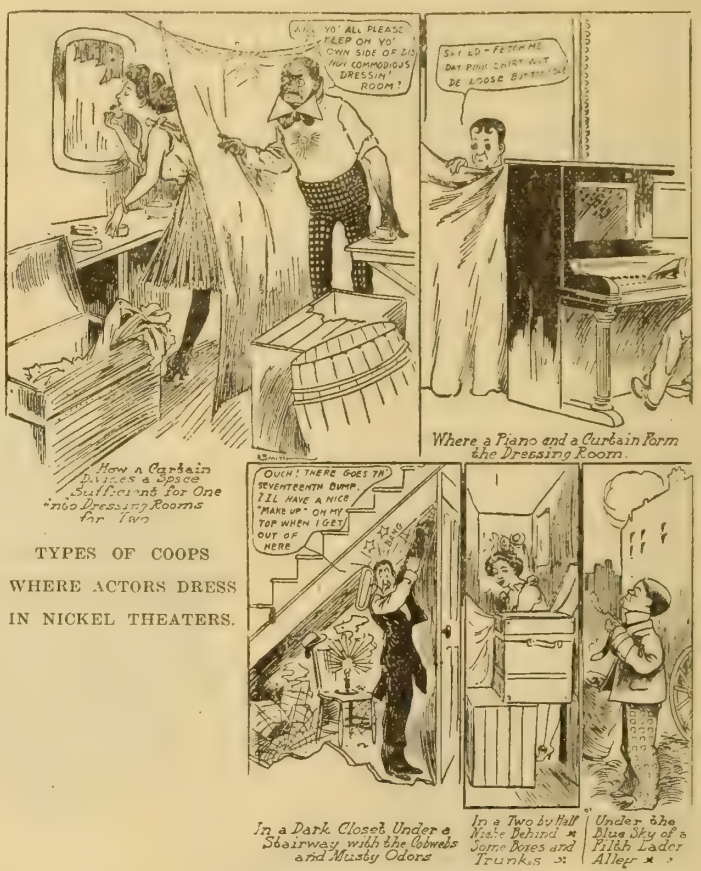
I have written for the good of the industry and I have to acknowledge that the Moving Picture World has backed me, but now we are facing a very unpleasant position. The persons directly in this fight—the manufacturers, the exchanges, the exhibitors—seem as cool as cucumbers. They do not give us a single word of encouragement. On another hand, the parties who are doing their best to bring ruin are kicking, are sending some fierce letters and threaten the paper with discontinuing their advertisements.

Respectfully,
JNO. M. BRADLET.

[This is so, but we hope to stand by our colors and voice the sentiment of everyone who has at heart the permanent welfare of this business. Some people cannot see beyond the tip of their nose. The day's gate receipts is the focus of their vision—no thought of the future. The wise commend our policy and are with us.—Ed.]

THE ACTORS' UNION AND THE NICKEL THEATERS.

The Actors' Union, of Chicago, is at loggerheads with the Moving Picture Theater Owners' Association over the conditions that prevail in the dressing rooms of the nickel theaters. It seems that an investigation disclosed the fact that these "dressing rooms" were corners curtained off, or the actor had to crouch under a stairway, or behind a tier of boxes, or on the housetop, or in an alley—anywhere but in "rooms." Whites and blacks and male and female intermingled, according to a long article published in the Chicago "Tribune" of March 10, with illustrations, of which the following is a reduced fac-simile.



How a Curtain Divides a Space Sufficient for One into Dressing Rooms for Two Where a Piano and a Curtain Form the Dressing Room.
In a Dark Closet Under a Stairway with the Cobwebs and Musty Odors
In a Two by Half Niche Behind Some Boxes and Trunks
Under the Blue Sky of a Filth Lader Alley

TYPES OF COOPS WHERE ACTORS DRESS IN NICKEL THEATERS.

If the conditions are as represented, it is a mighty good argument for the general abolition of vaudeville in the five-cent shows. Actors of good standing will not be seen there, and the class who do are those who bring no credit to the show. Fool competition is responsible for the evil. One showman will put on a vaudeville act so as to go his neighbor, who is running straight pictures, one better. Not to be outdone, the other gets two acts; the first adds a third act, and so on. After the munificent salaries of the "actors" are paid, does the exhibitor have more cash in his till than if he had given one or two reels and a song? A man no doubt has the right to run his business as he may see fit, while he may not be able to see that he is making an ass of himself at the same time. If the exhibitors' associations do not take in hand the pruning of these atrocities that are perpetrated in the name of vaudeville, the exchange men and the manufacturers will benefit, instead of injure their business, by cutting off the supply of films to any such ill-conducted theater.

Next week we will commence publishing a valuable series of articles that ought to be seen and read by every operator and manager of a moving picture theater. Our readers and salesmen in the exchanges will kindly call the attention of their friends to this fact and recommend the World to their customers. We will be pleased to mail a specimen copy to anyone who is interested.

New York City.—J. P. Vielbert, proprietor of the Open Air Theater, at 149th street and Third avenue, has leased a plot at 138th street, between Third and Alexander avenues, and will occupy it as a moving picture theater, with a seating capacity of 2,000.

MORE LIGHT IN THE THEATERS.

The Chief of the Bureau of Licenses, in New York, has submitted to the Mayor a plan for avoiding the darkness in moving picture show houses. Much of the objection of the clergy to these places is the darkness, which they claim to be the cloak for immorality. Agitation is now for more light, and all inventors of schemes for accomplishing this should come forward with their ideas at this time. In our last issue we referred to a special screen, the invention of A. L. Simpson, which is in use in one New York theater and which permits the house lights to be used so that faces can be distinguished all over the theater. Much can be done by simply shading the lamps so that the direct rays do not reach the screen and placing them so that they do not shine into the faces of the spectators.

PATHE'S SOUTHERN OFFICE.

Mr. C. W. Linn, the representative of Pathe Freres at Birmingham, Ala., advises us that the office will be transferred to New Orleans, La., on April 1 and that the location will be 813 Union street. The new office will be a more central shipping point for their Southern trade, which has largely increased.

SWANSON WANTS EDISON HEADS, I. E., MACHINE HEADS, NOT THE DOME OF GENIUS.

As will be noticed from our advertising pages, Wm. H. Swanson & Co. are open to buy 500 Edison machine heads and desire that the lowest price be named in the first letter. Their address is 160 Lake street, Chicago, Ill.

SUNDAY CLOSING.

Is enforced by a recent decision of the Mayor of Lowell, Mass. Also by the Chief of Police of Dover, N. H.

The law in Canada is to be amended so that exhibitors who keep open on Sunday can be sent to jail. As it stands at present they are simply fined.

NEW JERSEY BARS MINORS FROM SHOWS.

Trenton, March 17.—The House to-day passed, by a vote of 33 to 15, a bill to prevent the attendance of children in theaters, dance halls, moving picture shows and other places of amusement unless accompanied by parents or guardians. It is designed to take the place of a similar law enacted last year, which was declared unconstitutional by the Court of Errors and Appeals because it exempted the Atlantic City piers.

ANOTHER FILM D'ART.

Pathe will issue for the Easter week another of those artistic productions posed by leading members of the Comedie Francaise. The title is "The Kiss of Judas" and the subject is issued at a most desirable time.

CENSORS SEE 18,000 FEET OF FILMS.

A committee of the Board of Censorship met Thursday with the censors of the Motion Picture Patents Company, and together inspected 18,000 feet of new films. It was the first meeting of the kind, and took place at No. 80 Fifth avenue.

Prof. Charles Sprague Smith, of the People's Institute, was the chief censor present yesterday, and he was aided by John Collier, Mrs. Josephine Reading, editor of Vogue; Albert Shiels, District Superintendent of Public Schools on the lower east side, and N. Joseph Slicklen, official secretary to the censors.

For six hours with a brief interval for lunch the critics sat in darkness while all sorts of pictures, humorous, romantic and melodramatic, were reeled off. Here are a few of the titles: "Help! Police!" "The Drunkard's Reformation," "Old Aunt Hannah's Cat," "The Wooden Indian," "Larry, the Limit of Deviltry," "Every Lass a Queen," "The Auto-Maniac," "Oh, Rats!" "The Fish Pirates" and "The Guardian Angel."

"There are certain scenes," said Censor John Collier, after the day's work was ended, "which we shall doubtless tell the picture people to cut out. We cannot afford to be too critical to start with and we shall not cut out pictures simply because they are of the blood-and-thunder sort. We don't object to highly melodramatic scenes as such, but we shall seek to have as little gore displayed as possible.

"One picture we shall reject showed young women dressed to represent various nations. A sailor in the picture thinks he is in love with each in turn but finally makes up his mind that he prefers the American girl. There is nothing immoral in the picture but it is not artistic.

"We shall also take up at once the objectionable posters so often seen in front of these shows, indicating that questionable scenes are on exhibition within."

Dwight Macdonald, general manager of the Moving Picture Patents Company, said last night that the moving picture men were as anxious as the censors to weed out objectionable pictures.

"We shall blacklist moving picture men that show improper pictures," said he, "and shut off their supply of films. They must also comply with the regulations of the Health and Fire Departments."

CURTAINYLINE.

Is a preparation, for some time on the market, manufactured by Curtainyline Curtain Company, Chicago, Ill. It is, as the name indicates, a paint preparation for moving picture curtains by the manufacturers claimed wonderfully to improve the brilliance and depth of the picture, eliminating the yellow and producing a beautiful black and white. "In producing a brilliant color and bringing subjects out in bold relief upon the curtain I consider Curtainyline the greatest preparation known. It has enhanced the value of my pictures over 50 per cent."—is the testimonial of a Western exhibitor, one of the many daily received by the Curtainyline Company. A representative of the Moving Picture World dropped, the other day, into a 5-cent theater where he was informed Curtainyline was going to be applied. The curtain was covered about half when he arrived and a picture thrown on the screen to demonstrate the difference to a crowd of exhibitors who had collected to watch the proceedings. The result was very gratifying and the preparation seems to do everything claimed for it by the manufacturers. We know of many places where it could be used to advantage where the old screen has done duty week in, week out and accumulated a deposit of dust and grease which takes the life out of the picture. The Curtainyline is endorsed by Carl Laemmle, Wm. H. Swanson, Jones, Link & Schafer, George Hines and other leading renters and exhibitors. At any rate it doesn't cost very much to try it—a $3 package will cover 150 square feet.

TRADE NOTES.

The Centaur Film Company, recently incorporated, with offices in New York and factory at Bayonne, N. J., will release their first subject on April 1 and follow up with a regular weekly shipment. They are at work on some new sketches with a distinctly American flavor.

Another American factory started this week in New York City, equipped with the latest and best European machinery, and European expert help in the mechanical department. The studio will be under the management of an American stage manager and American actors will pose for the camera. Beginning next week, two subjects will be released, which output will be kept up and increased as the necessity demands. The output of this new American company will be sold entirely through the Film Import and Trading Company, which, with their regular imports, places this company in a very favorable position to supply the incessant demand for new Independent film. "Powhattan" is the trade mark of the new film.

The Jos. Levi Co. (Inc.), of 64 East Fourteenth street, have made a new departure in announcement slides, and our readers' attention is directed to their announcement elsewhere. The rapid rise of this concern, which has been in operation less than two years, can only be laid to the fact that they deliver the goods, and goods of quality, else the demand would not continue. The factory facilities are now so taxed that a move will shortly be made to quarters four times the size. Their song slide department is also flourishing, and exclusive rights have been obtained from leading song publishers, which means a steady supply of new songs from this concern. The slides for these songs are posed with evident pains and the coloring is very tastefully executed. Mr. Levi says that wherever he has sent a set of his song slides it has resulted in a standing order being placed, and this alone is the best kind of encouragement and appreciation of the work of a comparatively new concern.

MOTION PICTURE PATENTS COMPANY.

THEIR POLICY AND PROCEDURE.

The Motion Picture Patents Company, which represents the principal film producers of the world, a hundred film exchanges and upward of five thousand moving picture theaters in every State in the Union, is determined that the campaign inaugurated last week against undesirable pictures shall be carried out thoroughly, and has extended its activities even to the cleaning up of the theaters in which the pictures are shown. With that end in view a department has been established whose duty is to investigate every theater in the United States holding a license from the Patents Company, and the license of any theater that is not sanitary, clean and light, and that does not comply strictly with the fire laws, will be revoked. The following statement is given out by one of the officials of the Company:

OFFICIAL STATEMENT BY M. P. P. COMPANY.

"It is our intention to put the motion picture show on a basis with the very highest class of theatrical performances from every standpoint. We have long realized the tremendous educational possibilities of the motion picture, showing as it does in every town of seven hundred and fifty inhabitants in the length and breadth of this country and appealing as it does to the masses of poor and the millions of school children to whom the cheap rate of admission is a boon, accordingly we are working not only to make all future films of an educational and cleanly amusing type, but are determined that the theaters shall be made attractive and wholesome. The day of the dingy room picture show has passed and gone. Agitators who are seeking legislation against the picture show will find that we have anticipated them and that their efforts will no longer be required. All we ask is a fair test of the reforms that this company has instituted, which of course cannot be carried to completion in a day. No industry so vast as this one can be reconstructed at one fell swoop; but investigations are now under way in every section, and results that will surely gratify the most exacting critics will rapidly and positively be shown."

R. G. BACHMAN AND THE PATENTS COMPANY.

Seeing nothing but failure staring us in the face, caused by the demands of the Trust, we loosened up, cancelling our connections, and giving the Trust manufacturers fourteen days' notice to stop our service. The news dealt the Trust a severe blow, to think an exchange would have the dignity to cut them off. A meeting was at once called, and instead of the Trust showing an equal amount of principle, they shut off my supply immediately, without any respect to the fourteen-day clause in their Trust contract. In the meantime I had prepared for the emergency and had the pick of twenty-seven reels to supply my business. The Trust figured that if they would shut me off immediately, it would cripple my business, but, thanks to the patriotic blood that runs through the veins of my customers, notices were mailed to all our patrons, one day in advance of our wire cancelling our contract with the Trust manufacturers. Telegrams and letters began pouring in from all parts of the United States in less than twenty-four hours congratulating us for the move we had taken and assuring us of their hearty support. Thus far we have not lost one single account, and if the Trust don't see the gigantic blunder they have committed in the next thirty days they will go down in defeat at the hands of American citizens, who know right from wrong. The charges they have made thus far are only slight. Their object is to catch us with a six-months' supply on hand, and then demand the return of all these films; consequently, all there will be left for us to do is to walk out and quit the business. Then, right here is where the exhibitor gets it. If he wants Trust film he must pay higher prices for his service and the additional outrageous royalty for patents that he already paid for in full when he purchased his machine outright years ago, long before anyone ever dreamed of framing up a hold-up graft—and, years afterwards, a Trust is formed to corner you both ways. We bought film outright about a year ago at 8 cents per foot; now we are charged 11 cents per foot, with the raw material to produce films at a reduction to-day over that of a year ago. Any person with an ounce of sense can see the cold-blooded hold-up of the Trust, trying to squeeze every cent there is in the business right out of the exchange and exhibitor. It won't be long before they will claim ownership of your machine, and if you are not mighty careful they may do so now. These are my true opinions. I have been in this business since 1896, and have a fair knowledge of right and wrong, and would not have made this Independent move had it not been thoroughly considered. I hope that the readers of this paper will put their shoulders to the wheel to help along a cause that George Washington risked his life for—INDEPENDENCE.

R. G. BACHMAN.

TRENTON THEATERS OPPOSE VAUDEVILLE COMBINATIONS.

Through the shows committee of the Council, the legitimate theaters of Trenton have commenced a crusade against the moving picture theaters, which they charge are violating the law by running vaudeville acts. The legitimate theaters pay a license fee of $150 a year, while the moving picture concerns are licensed for $50, with the understanding that only moving pictures shall be shown. The big theaters claim that they should be compelled to pay the regular license or be forced to comply with the law.

"NEMESIS."

Our office boy has ambitions. One is that some day he hopes to ride a bucking broncho and take part in some of the Wild West productions of Selig and Essanay, which he never misses seeing and says are "the whole cheese." Next to drawing his salary he would rather draw cartoons all day than perform the simple duties for which he is hired. In this respect he does not differ from any other specimen of that untamed animal—the average American boy. The other day we caught him trying to conceal some papers, which we promptly replevined. They proved to be pen and ink sketches, one of which is reproduced herewith. Others may follow as space permits, as they bear on some humorous aspects of the film business, and you don't have to step on a tack to see the point.

WEEKLY COMMENTS ON THE SHOWS.

By Our Own Critic.

"I can't stand it," was the remark of a Post Office employee, who sat on my right on the occasion of my visit to the moving picture theater on Park Row, New York City, last week. They were commencing to show the Vitagraph picture, "A Home at Last," and my neighbor evidently had no use for the morbid theme of that picture, so he quitted for the sunlight. I don't blame him, for this film, although photographically good, illustrates a melancholy and depressing subject, which I am surprised that such an up-to-date company as the Vitagraph should put out. Surely in this alleged land of humor there are plenty of comedy subjects to be had at a fair market price!

This ten-cent moving picture house is situated on the fringe of the financial quarter of the Empire City of the West, and I was at some pains to take stock of my fellow patrons of the show, who were mostly prosperous looking men, bright, intelligent, cultured—as good a class an andience as any place of entertainment could desire. It would have done the heart of Canon Chase good to see the kind of people enjoying an innocent form of entertainment. This moving picture theater is prettily decorated and well conducted, and will probably be a permanent feature of Park Row.

That is, if the entertainment is of the first class. Which, at present, it is not. True, they advertise fresh pictures every day, but these pictures might be better. Let me take, as an illustration, the Essanay film of "The Road Agents." This is a long, long story of a California hold-up, into which a tremendous lot of good producing and photographic work is put, but it is incoherent, and it is undramatic, though it would probably read well in a book. On the screen, however, the story is not obvious—the result is that the Park Row audience did not seem to know what it was about, so the picture passed in silence. Far more concise and telling in action was the Pathe subject, "The Ring Leader." This illustrates the story of an industrial strike, with the incidents of conspiracy, treachery, riot, a death, and the condign punishment of the ring leader. A simple subject, very dramatically told, which the Park Row audience at least understood, although they did not applaud it. No, they reserved their applause for the Pathé subject, called "The Jealous Hubby," which shows what an ass a man may become when torn by unreasonable jealousy of his wife. One of the incidents was screamingly funny, and we in Park Row laughed uproariously at it. The man sees a hair on his wife's dress and thereupon assails and assaults all sorts of innocent men whom he suspects of intriguing with his wife. This was the only laugh I had that afternoon. It cost me ten cents, and I think it was somewhat dear.

Song slides apparently are popular in Park Row. There was a very well colored set illustrating "Nobody Knows, Nobody Cares," and the accompanying song to them was well sung by a young lady.

Now, if I know anything about the amusement needs of the high-class down-town audience of a moving picture theater, they want lightness, brightness, humor, which they certainly did not get in sufficient quanity on the occasion of the visit I am describing. I came out of the show somewhat depressed, and so did everybody else; but I will go again sometime, and I hope that the manufacturers will have profited by the hints that I am here giving them.

The manufacturers have apparently agreed upon some form of censorship as to the moral and ethical quality of their productions, but it remains for each of them individually to set up a standard of dramatic quality to which all their films must conform. The fate of the moving picture, judging by the attitude towards it of the high-class Park Row audience, trembles in the balance. If the American manufacturers continue to turn out undramatic, obscure, incoherent, loosely treated themes, then Park Row, New York, will soon get tired of bestowing its patronage on the ten-cent theater, and the manufacturer will find, when too late, that "not all the King's horses and all the King's men can put Humpty Dumpty together again."

"Sherlock Holmes."—We have had occasion to comment very favorably on the excellent staging and photography of the series of films issued by the Great Northern Film Company under the above heading. Taken in connection with a comment in our issue of the 13th, in which a film bearing the same title was severely criticised, the remarks may appear to some to be contradictory. In justice to the Great Northern Company we wish to explain that the last mentioned film bore no maker's name, and as the several comments were made by the same critic they were equally fair. Some time ago another concern sent out a film under the title of "Sherlock Holmes," but evidently did not have enough respect for their own work to stamp it with their imprint.

Comments on Film Subjects.

THE WEEK'S FILMS.

With such a film as "The Return of Ulysses" to head the list the past week has been notable in the motion picture field. A number of exceptionally strong films have been released, some of them heart stories so powerful that their memory clings long after the film has been seen.

"And a Little Child Shall Lead Them" is one of the strongest films produced in some time. It is a simple story, but it touches the heart and holds one quiet until the end, and scarcely a dry eye is seen in any audience when it closes. "The Strolling Players" and "The Justice of the Redskin" are both strong films, though not as classic as the first mentioned. A number of good record films came out and there was the usual output of comics. As a whole, the week has been a good one and the pictures issued deserve long life. They are all good.

The hold upon the people has been noted at a good many different theaters. The influence has been substantially the same. This should prove conclusively that a good film, one that tells a good story, will be appreciated wherever it is shown. The mistaken idea that some audiences wanted all blood and rapine is passing, and it can't disappear any too soon.

"A Little Child Shall Lead Them."—A Biograph subject which cannot fail to grip the heart of every person who sees it. In two theaters there was scarcely a dry eye in the house. A couple lose a dearly loved child. He dies with a toy dog clasped in his arms. This is cherished for years, even though another little one comes to the household. Finally the father and mother have a bitter quarrel and agree upon a separation. When dividing the various articles in the house they get along famously until they come to the little dog. The little girl takes it down and asks who has it. Both reach out their hands for it, and the hands clasp. Shortly they are in each other's arms crying over the dog, and a reconciliation follows. The acting in this picture is better than the average. The mother's facial expression is a study, both while the child is dying and when she is looking at the dog. The photography is good in the main, though there is too much of the soot and whitewash style of lighting in some scenes. But the picture, as a whole, will attract because of the tenderness of the subject, and because of the part a little child plays in it.

"A Friend In the Enemy's Camp."—A Vitagraph picture which has elements of dramatic interest. A little girl is stolen from her frontier home by the Indians and taken down the river in a canoe. Her pioner father discovers his loss and starts after her. Meanwhile she has been taken to camp, where she is turned over to the care of the women. Among them is a girl scarcely older than the captive, who, when the braves are asleep, assists the little one to escape and go to the banks of the river, where her father sees her and takes her into his canoe, with the Indians, who have awakened and missed their captive, in full pursuit. He shoots one Indian and the other is killed by the child's mother just as he reaches the shore. The photography is weird enough to attract attention and the acting is reasonably good.

"The Secretary's Revenge."—A story from the Gaumonts in which a supposed intrigue between a wife and a gentleman friend almost leads to a duel and a separation. A secretary, to obtain revenge for some much needed discipline, writes an anonymous letter, which the husband is ready to believe and challenges an old friend to a duel. Fortunately, the difficulty is obviated and the secretary gets his deserts before anything really serious occurs. The acting is good and the technical quality of the film is quite up to the Gaumont standard.

"On the Brink."—A Pathe which illustrates the dangers which beset girls who listen to the stories of what they may see in the city. This farmer's daughter runs away with a city man, but she is found by her father and taken home shortly afterward. She reached the brink, but did not go over. It is a good enough story of its kind, but that particular kind becomes monotonous easily.

"The Electric Belt."—One of those pictures from the Pathes which illustrate the vigor which is supposed to reside in some nostrum like a belt. The picture creates a good deal of sport, but after all it may be questioned whether it is the right sort of sport. Some of the scenes are rather queer.

"Cohen at Coney Island" and "Cohen's Dream of Coney Island" is the first comic from the Vitagraph studio for a long time, and to say that it creates laughter is putting it very mildly. It is a bang up reel.

"Pocket Policemen" and "Japanese Magic," a comedy reel from Gaumont, pleases the young folks. We overheard considerable guessing among the audience at Keith's Bijou Dream as to how the clever transformations were accomplished. Gaumont's man is up to all the tricks of the camera.

"Lady Killer Foiled."—A Pathe with the distinctive French flavor that makes it foreign to the understanding of Americans. A lady killer forces his attentions upon a woman and is promptly told to mind his business. But he follows her into the house and gains entrance to her room in a number of different ways which seem incredible to Americans. Such a thing would not be tolerated here, and the picture must be looked at from the French standpoint.

"Our Ice Supply."—A Lubin which illustrates very clearly the methods of ice harvesting as practised in this country. Apart from showing the operations of an immense industry this film has little interest. It is good, though the photography fails in some places, due, perhaps, to unfavorable light. As a whole, however, the picture will attract interest, because it describes something people know about but comparatively few have ever seen.

"Day of the Dog."—A Lubin which tells an excellent story, but it must be confessed that it is impossible to see any connection between the title and the picture. An employer forces his attentions upon one of his young women employees, but she loves another of the employees in the same shop, and they go around the corner and get married. The man is immediately discharged, and the girl is sent for. The employer tries to take liberties with her, but she beats him over the head with a stick and escapes. Then poverty follows the couple until they are reduced to the lowest point of existence. He fails to secure work, but takes part in a thrilling rescue at a fire. The man rescued proves to be his former employer, who makes him a partner in the business, and the little family disappears in the happiness of new clothes and an automobile. It is a good story, well told, and the photography and action are both reasonably good. Such melodramas unquestionably please. It appeals to the sense of fair play and really leads one to think that misfortune is partially overcome in this world, even if there are many hard places left.

"Strolling Players."—This picture from the Edison works reproduces, as well as it is possible to do in these times, the strolling players which were common in England a century or more ago. Along with the general picture of the players the story teller has interwoven a tale of cruelty and hardship which is probably reproduced with reasonable accuracy. It isn't quite clear what the last scene means. The play was reproduced for the benefit of the gathering about a roadside inn, but meanwhile a lord had appeared and a real drama was being enacted. The stage play was made more vivid by the substitution of a letter written by the wife of one of the players to Lord Devon. The maddened player turns upon his wife and chokes her to the floor. She struggles to her feet and rushes from behind the curtain, only to fall insensible at the feet of the lord. He carries her out of the scene as the husband is arrested, but it isn't quite clear whether she dies or not. Perhaps this is purposely left for each one who sees it to supply the ending which suits him best. The staging is excellent and the acting is good. The technical quality is up to the usual Edison standard.

"An Amateur Acrobat."—A Pathe comic which shows how a partially inebriated individual undertook to copy the stunts of an acrobat on the stage. The scrapes he gets into and the damage he does are funny enough to keep the audience roaring most of the time. Like all the Pathe films, the technical quality cannot be questioned.

"The Magic Dice."—A Pathe in which the magical powers of dice are illustrated. It is one of the popular magical series brought out by this house, is beautifully colored, and the acting of the various characters is smooth and good. The way the dice are juggled and transformed first into one thing and then into another is remarkable. The ballet is an interesting addition to a dice game, even though the game is different from any other ever seen.

"The Justice of a Redskin."—A story of the plains from the Pathe studio which illustrates one of the important characteristics of the Indian, his absolute fidelity to what he believes to be justice. A traveler on the plains violates the hospitality of a host, robs him and kills his daughter, and leaves indications which point to an Indian. Another Indian sets out after him and follows him over rocks and through almost impassable defiles until he finally runs him down. It is very spectacular and holds the audience silent. Having captured him, the Indian fastens him to his horse and drags him some distance, then picks him up and carries him to the man's cabin and there, before the dead body of the girl he murdered, kills him. Afterward he hurls the body into a stream and watches it sink from view. It is all very powerfully told and convincing, and one almost shudders as he watches the relentless Indian follow the murderer till he captures him.

"The Settlement Workers."—A powerful drama which will shortly be issued by Selig, depicts a phase of life in New York's lower east side, which is gradually being changed to better conditions by the noble work of the settlement workers. The producer deserves credit for the fidelity with which the scenes are presented, and while some of them are not pleasant to look upon, they are true to the life, and their presentation will serve the good purpose of calling attention to the haunts of the vagabond and the triumph of good over evil. A little love episode adds interest to the story, which is worked out in Selig's best style.

"The Elixir of Dreams."—A Pathe which affords opportunity for some of their fantastic work which is so entertaining. A Perriot is given a phial of the Elixir of Dreams by a fairy, and, after drinking it, he falls asleep to dream that he is transported to some unknown country, where he is made a ruler and the whole populace bows to him for a time and then chases him out of the premises. There are several ballets and other entertaining features, and the film deserves to rank as a high-class comic. It is beautifully tinted and the action is spirited.

"Doll Making."—An educational picture from Pathe which illustrates the making of a doll very clearly. These films are all good, and sometimes one is disposed to think that there should be more of them. There is always interest in the origin of familiar objects, and this one of the making of dolls entertains and interests alike. It is a safe film to include in any programme. It pleases old and young alike.

"The Energetic Street Cleaner."—A bit of comedy from the Essanay studio which affords an opportunity for their popular comedian to show his quality. A man is given employment in the department of street cleaning and goes about his work so vigorously that everything which comes in his path is swept away, including people. Few films are greeted with more laughter than this. It is lively and the sport is clean.

"Mr. Pallett Goes Landscaping."—An Eclipse which shows the difficulties encountered by an artist who attempts to paint landscapes out-of-doors. Some of the troubles are funny, others only passably interesting, but he gives up in despair and concludes to try a still life in the studio, but his adverse fate follows him there and his models walk off the table very strangely.

"New Cut Roads Up Mt. Blanc."—A Pathe record film showing the new roads up Mt. Blanc, with trains and other interesting features. It is almost as good as actually climbing the mountain, and vastly more comfortable. The photography is unusually good and the views are all that could be asked from a scenic standpoint.

"A Midnight Disturbance."—A picture from the Essanay studio which introduces the popular chase in a varied form. A burglar enters a house at night and is discovered by a woman, who chases him out at the muzzle of a revolver. He goes from floor to floor, arousing people wherever he goes, and all promptly join in following him down the fire-escapes and through windows, making a very laughable ten minutes. This is the film in the rehearsals of which their comedian, Mr. Turpin, lost some of his skin while the tenacious bulldog was being trained to hold on to the seat of his pants. The sketch is a good one and gets the laughter, but is rather drawn out, and some of the scenes could have been cut down without injury to the whole.

"The Seminole's Vengeance."—In this film from the Kalems something of the spirit of the old slavery days in the South is introduced and developed. The slave catchers of those times were not particular who they caught, provided they could dispose of them as slaves afterward. And this characteristic is made the basis of the story. The acting is unusually good and the capture and carrying away of the girl are so vividly portrayed that one almost feels as though it were an actual occurrence. Then comes the long ride on the wagon through the unbroken Southern forest, the meeting of the Seminoles who kill the slave catchers and burn their bodies in a fire of brushwood. It is all graphic and all brings back something of the flavor of those times which tried the souls of true men. The film is recommended as picturing something of the historic memories of those days. It will show to very many of this generation what happened before the war for freedom.

"Master Goes Shopping."—Here is a bit of comedy from the Eclipse studio which should be utilized as a shining example to wives whose husbands interfere with the house hold affairs. The master decides that he can do the marketing better than anyone else in the house. How well he accomplishes it is shown when his wife turns the basket bottom up over his head. It is well photographed and well acted and brings rounds of applause.

"Canadian Winter Carnival at Montreal."—The Edison Company has portrayed some of the most important features of the carnival of the present Winter at Montreal. There is the ski jumping, which is extremely realistic, the long sleigh ride, the snow shoeing and the tobogganing. All are realistic and cause one to feel the invigorating spirit of the time and occasion. This film should be popular and ought to make a welcome addition to any programme.

"The Convict's Revenge."—The Pathes have added another good film to their long list. A chain gang is seen guarded by an officer who finds it necessary to reprove one of them very sharply. When going in at night he escapes and runs to the ocean where he secretes himself behind some rocks. Right here is a strong scene. The rocks are seen with the escaped convict clinging to them while the sea breaks over him again and again. Finally he manages to crawl up and get away. The officer, supposing him drowned, return. They stop at the house for a moment to tell the story. The officer's little child is sitting by the door. The convict creeps up and steals the little one and starts to run. But the loss is discovered and the posse follow. They come upon the convict, who, brought to bay, holds the child as a shield from bullets. The mother begs for the child which he finally gives her, and this is another strong scene. Then he dashes into the brush, falls into a ravine and is found dead at the bottom. It is a good film, and is quite up to the Pathe quality technically.

"Uncle Reuben's Courtship."—A comedy from the Lubin studio which makes the house actually roar with laughter. Uncle Reuben discovers an advertisement of a widow who is evidently looking for a husband. Immediately he goes to the widow's home and makes some extremely vigorous demonstrations. A dude calls and is promptly pitched out of the window. A very tall gentleman calls and has his height reduced one-half by some applications of a chair on his head, and a third gentleman is divested of most of his clothing in very short order. Uncle Reuben then has the winsome widow all to himself and she succumbs to his vigorous wooing. The action is good and the audience laughs continuously.

"The Musician's Dream."—A Gaumont which introduces some elements of magic which are not common in this firm's pictures. A musician falls asleep and a fairy appears and conducts him to a place in a distant woodland, gives him a wand for a baton and disappears. When he undertakes to direct his orchestra of girls they change into men and there are all sorts of queer stunts before the dream ends. But the musician is rudely awakened by his viol falling upon his head. It is well worked out and the suggestions of fairy lore are pleasing.

"Music and Poetry."—A Pathe comic which has more elements of actual fun in it than many. On one side of a partition dwells a musician who plays the trombone and plays it vigorously. On the other side dwells a poet who undertakes to court the muses. His neighbor begins to play and the poet finds work impossible. He complains to the janitor, who sees the musician. But he is only angered and goes out and gets all the organ grinders and street bands within reach to come and play under the poet's window. He throws out all his belongings to get rid of them and finally pours a quantity of water on the janitor, who secures his arrest. The action is good and the film creates hearty laughter.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FILM MANUFACTURERS OVERLOOK DETAILS.

Grand Rapids, Mich., March 19, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—To-day I saw "Selig's" new film, "Boots and Saddles," and I am compelled to enter my criticism from the standpoint of a military man.

The story is somewhat hazy, but the excuse for it is a joke. Whoever saw an army officer gambling with enlisted men? It is against army regulations and demoralizing to the service for the officers to engage in games of chance with enlisted men.

Another thing about the picture that is inconsistent is the uniforms. From the story one would suppose the events portrayed happened about twenty or thirty years ago, yet the soldiers' uniforms are the same as worn to-day, with the addition of a couple of white stripes on the backs of the coats. I have never seen a uniform of this kind worn in the army, and if this is the uniform that was worn thirty years ago, why do the soldiers wear the latest pattern service hats in the picture?

The public, as a rule, don't notice these details, but to one familiar with military affairs the whole picture smacks strongly of burlesque.

Another inconsistency on the part of most of the film makers is the battle and fight scenes pulled off in the studios with the painted rocks and trees for a background. Such scenes should be posed out of doors and they would be so much more interesting and real, but to see a scrap in front of fake woods and rocks kills the whole effect.

I am interested in the picture business and appreciate a good film, and I must say that the European films are superior in many ways to the American film, because the European manufacturers seem to take especial pains with the small details, and I am sure the majority of brother exhibitors will agree with me on this point. Yours very truly.

A CRITICAL EXHIBITOR.

[The necessity of American manufacturers properly attending to the minor details of their productions was pointed out in our pages of March 13 and 20 in the article, "The Modern Way in Moving Picture Making."—Editor M. P. W.]

ANOTHER THEATER FOR TEXAS.

Wichita Falls, Texas, March 17, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—I am a reader of your magazine, and have been for some time, and look forth to its coming every week. I gain a great deal of knowledge and valuable information from its pages. I will soon be installed in my new house. This will be one of the finest ten-cent motion picture and vaudeville houses in all Texas. The name of my new place will be the "Folly," producing nothing but high-class licensed pictures and vaudeville; seating capacity of 315 people. Wishing you continued success, Truly yours,

GAIL S. DURHAM.
Manager, Folly Theater,

LETTER TO EXHIBITORS.

Chicago, February 18, 1909.

Gentlemen:

PUBLIC SENTIMENT IS WITH YOU.

You now have the support of the people, the greatest of all weapons with which to fight the "licensed" Combine, and a decisive victory is assured.

This is the result of the widespread publicity we have succeeded in gaining for the independent exhibitors and now you will reap the benefits. People everywhere are beginning to take notice. They want to patronize independent exhibitors only and are already doing so.

The opportunity is yours. Seize it. Cater to the desire of your patrons. Continue to hold out against the "licensed" Combine and sign nothing it offers. Instead, let the people in your locality know that you are independent and in no way connected with the Combine. This you can do on your advertising posters and by projecting a slide in your theater reading as follows:

"Independent Pictures Shown Here Only
They Are the Best
Not in a Trust"

Write for It. It's Free.

Stick it out—Don't sign. It matters not what options the "license" Combine may offer you, don't sign that agreement. Bear in mind these options in no way change the original.

It has not been changed and is back of all concessions the trust are making. You are offered these options for the sole purpose of blinding you to the real issue—that is, RECOGNIZING THE VALIDITY OF THE PATENTS, and if you sign anything at all or let any one else sign for you, you will be doing just what the Combine wants you to do, and besides

You Will Have to Pay Royalties.

Be careful—sign nothing and don't let others sign for you. That is the only way to be on the safe side. We especially want to impress upon you not to let others sign this agreement and pay royalties for you, as you will have to display the license in your theater which is significant of the fact that you recognize the validity of the patents.

If you have signed don't display the license. Better yet, take the "license" Combine at its word, demand the immediate return of your "licensed" application and your money. Make it prove "you can cancel your contract whenever you choose."

The stand taken by exhibitors has already swamped us with business. From every section of the country they are crying for the new independent films such as we are releasing, and notwithstanding the unexpected big increase in business we have been able to meet all demands and can furnish you with all of the films you need—the new independent stuff that is drawing big crowds wherever shown, and the kind that your trust competitor don't show.

Have no fear, as recent cablegrams from Europe contain the most favorable news yet received. You can get all of the independent films you want. The Combine knows this; it also knows that the new independent films are better than the licensed film. This is another reason why it wants you to bind yourself to use licensed films only.

Write us at once and let us furnish you with one of the above mentioned slides, and remember that the services of the most eminent attorneys, retained by us to help you win this fight, are at your disposal, free of charge. Don't forget to give us your correct address so that we can mail you the lists of new independent films we are releasing.

INDEPENDENTS VS. "TRUST."

Chicago, March 22, 1909.

Moving Picture World, 125 East 23d street, New York:

Gentlemen—I am enclosing herewith write-up which I would be pleased to have you insert in the Moving Picture World, entitled "Independents vs. Trust."

The Alaska Moving Picture and Amusement Company is managed by F. H. McGrew and C. L. Kemp. This company have two thousand feet of moving picture film, which they took themselves out in Alaska. They are at the present time and have been in Chicago for the past ten days and are renting these films to the five-cent theaters of this city.

These people had their film booked on Saturday night, March 20, 1909, at the National Theater, 5924 Halsted street, city. When the time came to deliver the film at this house, the manager was handed the following letter:

"The National Theater,
"5924 S. Halsted street, Chicago.
"Gentlemen—I cannot supply you with Alaska films. Respectfully,
(Signed) "C. L. KEMP."

The above shows what the Trust's film exchanges will do to hold on to business. Now, if the Independent people expect to win out and protect the five-cent theaters, why cannot they do an act of the same kind? It is understood that the Trust exchanges supply films to the houses which have signed or rather accepted their agreement to use Trust films and no others. Now, as this is a fact, why don't the Independent people get together and canvass every city in the United States and go to each theater and agree to give them one week's service "free of charge" to show them the good quality of the Independent films which they are producing to-day? By doing this it is up to the Trust to cancel every house using the Independent goods and revoke their license. We all know that the people signing up with the Trust are

FIRST AID TO THE OPERATOR.

Baltimore, Md., March 21, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—The peek hole in the side of the lantern through which the operator watches the carbons, is generally covered with ruby glass. This color gives many operators a headache, and when the operator looks at the carbons and then at the picture, his eyes are dazzled for the moment. We have found great relief by having a piece of green glass set in the slot with the ruby, with the green next to the carbons. The burning of the carbons is easily seen through the two pieces and headaches and tired eyes are a thing of the past.

Trusting that this will be of use to some sufferer.

Yours truly. FINN & BRAUL.

ANOTHER CENSOR HEARD FROM.

Anthony, Kan., March 17, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Excuse the liberty I take in criticising the motion pictures, but a picture was shown here last week in which a gorilla kidnaps a woman and they fall in love with each other. Outside of frightening children, it was a most disgusting exhibition. Brutal murders, gruesome and impossible subjects are NOT what the people want. A degenerate might find them interesting, but never a healthy human being.

Yours truly, GEO. A. WILBUR.

INTERNATIONAL PROJECTING AND PRODUCING COMPANY'S FILM.

Chicago, March 16, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—A great deal of study has been given to the form of contract to be used in furnishing our International Projecting and Producing Company's service to the various exchanges.

As far as our Company is concerned, a simple contract covering the manner of payment, price of goods, and method of delivery, with a reasonable assurance that goods will be accepted and paid for by consignee on arrival at destination, would be sufficient. This would be about the only contract we would need. But a number of important exchanges have requested us to draw a form of contract whereby we could extend to all legitimate exchanges protection, as far as lies in our power, against the unscrupulous individual who might come into possession of our goods through misrepresentation. And as it is our desire to have our contract meet with the approval of all, we deem it advisable to furnish exchanges with service without restriction until we confer with a number of exchange representatives of the International Projecting and Producing Company, and, with their assistance, formulate a contract which will be acceptable to all parties concerned; which will be done at an early date.

The purpose of this letter is to reach those whom we have decided may handle our goods, but have not as yet completed arrangements; and is not intended for those who have already accepted our terms, etc.

All kinds of rumors have been circulated against the Independent movement, and the latest trick is, that a fictitious contract purporting to be an instrument executed by the International Projecting and Producing Company is being circulated containing unreasonable conditions, and should it be brought to your notice, you will know from whence such a document emanates and for what malicious purpose.

We therefore make a bona fide offer of $10,000 to any one holding a genuine printed or typewritten contract bearing the signature of any officer of the International Projecting and Producing Company, except a few simple contracts, which are written or typewritten, and in which the subject matter does not exceed 100 words, and which are entirely satisfactory to the exchanges having received them, and contain conditions identical to those herein stated, and we are quite sure that it will be satisfactory to you.

Our shipments will always be made for the entire week, and we must naturally, in dealing with the exchanges, trust to their honor not to release any reels until the regular release day, and will so continue this method of shipping until forced to change same through violation of confidence.

In order to avoid any misunderstanding whatever on the subject of the price of our film, we hereby notify all, that the price of our film is 11 cents per foot.

If you wish to order reels from us, and will write or wire us at once the number of reels you desire weekly, and will make satisfactory arrangements for prompt payment, we will be pleased to do business with you.

Yours very truly,
INTERNATIONAL PROJECTING AND PRODUCING COMPANY.

EXHIBITOR DISPLEASED WITH QUALITY OF FILMS.

Mr. Editor:—

Please give me space in your valuable journal for a few comments on films. First, I wish to say that the people in my town are tired out on Pathe pictures. His mysterious hand painted work and vaudeville dances are monotonous. They did fine when moving pictures were first introduced, but the people have seen enough of such and want something of a more substantial nature. It is a fact that the Pathe film is up to perfection in workmanship, being absolutely steady and if the subjects were good they would be excellent. Next, I wish to know why it is that the Lubin and Edison films are so shaky? I dread to exhibit the films on this account. Some of them are so shaky that you can scarcely read anything on the screen. The acting in the film, "The Railroad Detective," by the Kalem Company, is very poor at times, being more of a pretense.

ALABAMA EXHIBITOR.

THE TROUBLES OF THE OPERATOR.

Baraboo, Wis., March 13, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—In regard to Bro. Chas. H. Amos' article, in issue of March 6, World, while it is true every word, there is another side. Now some exhibitors install a machine (sometimes a second-hand one) or a good one that has been ruined and would be a disgrace to a scrap heap, and because it is a standard make or the parties that sold it to him say it is all right, the operator is up against it. If he kicks on using the same Mr. Exhibitor thinks the operator does not understand the machine, not knowing anything about it himself and not being capable of understanding same if shown. So Mr. Operator goes ahead if he wants to hold his position and at the expense of the film, and nine chances out of ten it is ruined and he can't help it, with the tools he has to work with.

As I write this I am running a film that was released just seven days ago. It has the left-hand sprocket holes cracked in corners the full length. Now I don't think that the film exchanges could invest a little money to better advantage than to have a man inspect each exhibitor that returns a film in bad condition and remedy the defect. He will listen to an outsider quicker than he will to one of his own employees. Hoping my letter will do some good, I remain,

Yours,
A. C. WALLACE.

Thos. Dippel asks if oxylithe with a calcium light outfit will give a strong enough light for a moving picture show in small towns where there is no electric lighting system? Yes, the halls in the small villages would also naturally be small, and a six-foot screen can be well illuminated with oxylithe and the lime jet.

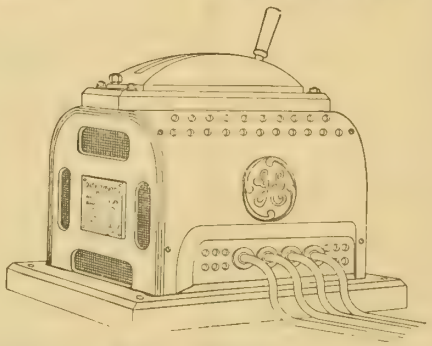
TRANSORMER

For Moving Picture Machines
(Alternating Current)

SIMPLE COMPACT EFFICIENT

THIS TRANSFORMER, KNOWN AS "THE G. E. ECONOMY-ARC" mustof necessity be an invaluable adjunct to any alternating current moving picture installation. THE ADVANTAGES OF A TRANSFORMER FOR THIS WORK WILL BE APPRECIATED by both the theatre management and operator; BY THE MANAGEMENT in the reduction of light bills and in the better production of the pictures due to the steady light obtained, AND BY THE OPERATOR in the simplicity of the device, the absence of danger from shocks,, and the added comfort in the lamp house due to the low heating.



Price, $75.00

THE SAVING IN POWER INSURED BY THE USE OF A TRANSFORMER INSTEAD OF A RHEOSTAT VARIES FROM 65 to 90 per cent., depending upon the voltage from the supply mains. Many lighting companies require the use of 220 volts for moving picture work in order to avoid heavily loading one side of a three wire system. This increases the loss considerably in circuits using a resistance or reactive device for reducing the voltage.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

THE MEDICINE BOTTLE.—This film demonstrates two things—the efficacy of that time-saving agent which out Mercurys Mercury, the telephone, and the importance of that movement to enforce a differential form of bottle in which to hold poisonous liquids. Mrs. Ross, whose mother is very ill, has in attendance a trained nurse, who has received an urgent message to come to her own home, owing to the illness of her sister. As Mrs. Ross is dressed and ready to attend an afternoon tea at Mrs. Parker's, this forced absence of the nurse is very inopportune. However, little Alice, Mrs. Ross's seven-year-old daughter, is a bright child, so she feels that she can trust her to look after her grandma, and give her the medicine at the regular intervals. Mrs. Ross, herself, is suffering from a painful abrasion on her hand, for which she has procured an antiseptic to bathe it with, which is a deadly poison. It happens that the antiseptic and grandma's medicine are contained in similar shaped bottles, and Mrs. Ross in her hurry and excitement takes away the wrong bottle. While at Mrs. Parker's, the hostess cuts her finger with a paper knife and Mrs. Ross offers her the antiseptic to bathe it, when she discovers she has carried away the medicine, leaving the poison for the child to give grandma. Looking at the clock, she finds it is on the hour of the administering of the dose. The poor woman is beside herself in fearful helplessness, when Mrs. Parker suggests the telephone. This she tries, and she is put in further trepidation at her inability to get connection, for at Central the operators are too busy chatting to take notice. She at length gets her home and is relieved to learn from the child that grandma has not been given the poison, owing to the fact that baby had spilt the first spoonful she poured out. Length, 472 feet.

JONES AND HIS NEW NEIGHBORS.—We are wont to say poor Jones, but are we sincere? For if it wasn't for Jones' misfortunes we would miss many a hearty laugh. There is one thing certain, no matter what trouble Jonesy gets into he manages to wriggle out of it like an eel. This time it looked serious, but he bobs up serenely just the same. The Joneses have moved and taken an apartment in one of a row of houses which are identically alike. The most natural thing happens; Jones gets into the wrong house, and, of course, his intrusion is vigorously resented, and it looked for a time he would suffer bodily injury, but, as usual, the menacing clouds dissipate and peace again reigns in the Jones domicile. Eddy may get some hard bumps, but they never scar. Length, 454 feet.

A DRUNKARD'S REFORMATION: The Most Powerful Temperance Lesson Ever Depicted.—

"Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his color in the cup, when it moveth itself aright; at the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder."—Prov., XXIII., 31-32.

The story told is a simple one, and grips from the very start. John Wharton, the husband of a true and trusting wife and father of an eight-year-old girl, through the association of rakish companions becomes addicted to the drink habit, and while the demon rum has not fastened its tentacles firmly, yet there is no question that given free rein the inevitable would culminate in time. Arriving home one afternoon in a wine besotted condition, he is indeed a terrifying spectacle to his little family. Later, after he has slept off the effects to some extent, while at supper, the little girl shows him two tickets for the theater, begging him to take her. After some persuasion he consents to go. The play is a dramatization of Emile Zola's "L'Assommoir," which shows how short a journey it is from peace and happiness to woe and despair by the road of rum. Here the picture shows both the action and the play and the psychological influence it has on the audience. Wharton especially. Here is shown a most clever piece of motion picture producing, portraying the downward path of the young man who was induced to take his first drink; how it finally became an unconquerable habit, causing poverty and suffering for his wife and child and death for himself, while at the same time presenting a sermon to Wharton in front, sinking deeper and deeper into his heart, until at the final curtain he is a changed man, going homeward with a firm determination that he will drink no more, which he promises his wife upon his return. Two years later we find the little family seated, happy and peaceful, at their fireside and we know that the promise has been kept. The photography of the subject is perfect. Length, 983 feet.

HARD TO BEAT.—Synopsis of scenes: Moses Finkelstein idolizes his son Ikey, with good reason, for Ikey's handling of prospective customers usually brings substantial returns. Ikey enters the store with a customer, who is finally "prevailed" upon to purchase a pair of trousers, and when paying for them displays a mammoth roll of bills. Noticing Ikey's covetous interest, the customer, who is a gambler, explains the large sums of money won at the gaming table by his secret methods, and generously offers to "let Ikey in" whenever he can furnish sufficient capital. Mr. and Mrs. Finkelstein praise Ikey for his business capacity, and Moses, in leaving the store, drops his wallet. Ikey finds it. The temptation of "chance" conquers. He decides to speculate. Ikey enters the gambling house—is quickly fleeced and thrown into the street. Moses discovers his loss and rushes back to the store and tells his wife, and both are frantic. Heartsick, Ikey wends his way back to the store. He sees a policeman talking with his father. Conscience stricken, he hides in a packing case outside the door. Meanwhile the police raid the gambling house. The money and chips are shoved into a grip and given to Sambo, the waiter. Sambo escapes. Passing Moses' store he espies a policeman, and drops the bag into the packing case where Ikey is hiding. Moses, disheartened, rolls the packing case into the store. Presently Ikey forces his leg through the case. With visions of burglars, Moses calls loudly for help. Suddenly a handful of greenbacks are thrust from the case. Ikey is finally released and tells his parents of the robbery, his brilliant detective work, and the recovery of the money. A happy family reunion follows. Length, 445 feet.

OH! RATS!—Synopsis of scenes: Bridget rules the household. The agitation of the "Servant Problem" in the family of Mr. and Mrs. Green is at an acute stage. To leave the domestic tyrant in absolute possession of the house seems its only solution. Bobby, the son, by chance discovers Bridget's insane fear of rats. Bobby tells his father, who uses the knowledge so advantageously that peace reigns once more in the household. Mamma enters the kitchen to see a peddler thrown through the doorway. Her protest against such conduct is immediately overruled by the servant, who forces her from the room. Papa, arriving home, volunteers to "correct matters" and starts for the scene of strife. Entering the kitchen, he finds the grocer in the hands of the tyrant. Interfering, he becomes the center of attack. Deluged with flour, he escapes. At the family "council of war" Bridget's discharge is decided. The discharge, passed to her through the doorway on a broom, is torn to bits, and papa, bombarded with crockery, beats a hasty retreat. Bobby entering with a pet rat shows it to Bridget; she screams and mounts a chair. Bobby's peals of laughter bring his parents, who are surprised to see Bridget madly leap through the doorway. In consultation, papa decides to use "rats" as a means of the servant's discharge. Bringing home a cage of big ones, he places two in a dish on the kitchen table, covers them, and hides to await developments. Things happen quickly. Bridget enters and removes the cover; the rats jump out; screaming, she mounts the chair. It is now papa's chance. He shows her the cage of big rats, threatening to let them out; she begs for mercy. Mamma and Bobby, prepared, enter with the servant's grips. Threatened with rats, she accepts her discharge and leaves, to the relief of all. Length, 485 feet.

ON THE WESTERN FRONTIER.—Synopsis of scenes: Among the tall trees and mountains of the Far West, a father, son and daughter dwell peacefully in their mountain cabin, close to nature, seldom hearing of the great restless world outside—happy in their isolation. Jack, the son, visiting town on business, is tempted into a gambling saloon and takes part in a game of cards. Dalton, a gambler, undertakes to fleece the boy. The result is a fight in which Dalton is shot, and Jack becomes a fugitive. The colonel of a nearby fort learns of the affair and sends his orderly with orders for a troop of cavalry to start in pursuit of the murderer. Jim Nelson, the boy's friend, who has witnessed all, held Jack's enemies off and enabled him to escape, immediately heads for the trail to intercept the orderly and delay the delivery of the message. He reaches the cabin to find that the orderly has stopped for a drink and to see Nell, Jack's beautiful sister, with whom he is in love. He explains his mission, but both are ignorant of whom it concerns. Jim drugs the orderly and renders him unconscious. Nell, returning to the room, finds the unconscious soldier; realizes the truth, and the importance of delivering the dispatch; dons a suit of her brother's clothes, puts on the orderly's overcoat, mounts his horse and starts for the fort with the order. Returning, she reaches the cabin to find her brother there and the soldiers approaching. She and the boy hide. The officer in command goes to the cellar to search. Jack escapes. Nell is discovered, roughly handled, and, hair down, stands convicted. The soldiers renew the hopeless pursuit. The orderly comes from hiding, embraces Nell, while Jim and the old father thank both for helping the boy escape. Length, 900 feet.

Annie gets the letter intended for Bob, and suspecting that Agnes is the sender, she tears it open, reads and keeps it, going into the next room away from Bob, who leaves with the postmaster. Agnes, outraged at the conduct of Annie opening her letters, determines to get even. She takes a bunch of mail matter—letters that Annie has been assorting—rips them open and places them in Annie's jacket pocket. Bob and Annie return. Agnes leaves as Bob is assisting Annie in putting on her jacket.

Scenes 3 and 4 show Agnes entering constable's office and swearing out a warrant against Annie as a mail thief.

Scene 5 shows Annie's home. Her father, the postmaster and a veteran of the Civil War, is asleep. Annie and Bob enter. Annie sits at the organ and sings for the old soldier, who wakes up and gives his blessing to the young lovers. Then Annie takes the old soldier to another room, leaving Bob alone. Bob now decides that it is a good time to get his letter. He goes to Annie's jacket, lying on a chair, searches for his letter and finds instead the package of letters which Agnes placed there. Horrified, he is about to call her to explain, when a knock at the door determines him to shield his sweetheart at any cost; so he hurriedly puts the letters into his pocket, goes to the door, opens it, admitting the constable and Agnes. Annie and her father re-enter. Agnes accuses Annie of stealing her letter. Bob steps forward, takes the letter, saying he is the thief, at the same time producing the package of letters. The constable arrests Bob and takes him off to jail. Agnes now accuses Annie to her father. Annie admits she opened Agnes' letter. The father curses Annie and drives her out of the house.

The scenes following show us how Annie, after leaving home, becomes a celebrated singer; how Agnes, stricken with remorse, confesses the theft of the letter; how Bob is liberated from prison on her confession; how Bob meets his sweetheart Annie (now a great singer), and finally the return home of the lovers.

THE FISH PIRATES; or, The Game Warden's Test.—Doubtless all are more or less familiar with the work of the Fish and Game Protective Associations throughout the United States. In every State we find associations of enthusiastic sportsmen who under legal authority work together for the enforcement of the laws for the protection of our fish and game. In most sections of the country seining is illegal, for it is well known that the nets take out enormous quantities of fish and if allowed would soon deplete every lake and stream. But everywhere the net fishermen persist in their illegal work and it is necessary for the game wardens to exercise every possible vigilance. Of course there is no love lost between the game wardens and the fish pirates, and this fact gives us the theme. In this case the situation is rendered more intense by the fact that the game warden, Stanton, who is the hero of our story, is in love with the fish pirate's daughter.

Scene I.—A Visit from the Fish Wardens—Stanton and the Pirate's Daughter. Scene II.—The Wardens on the Track of Evidence. Scene III.—Pirates Laying the Shad Seine. Scene IV.—Bringing in the Fish. Scene V.—The Wardens Seize the Seine. Scene VI.—Destroying the Nets—Stanton Captured by the Pirates. Scene VII.—At the Mercy of the Tide. Scene VIII.—Rescued at the Last Gasp. Scene IX.—The Fight Afloat—The Old Pirate Wounded. Scene X.—The Pirate's Death.

A JUST REWARD.—The interior of a carpet mill. The girls are at work. The foreman, a grouchy looking fellow, always ready to find fault, picks up the work here and there. He sneers at the girls. One resents his words; he takes her by the arm and scolds her. Gertie, another worker in the mill, reproaches the foreman for his act. He tells her to go. Now all the girls lay down the work and decide to stand by Gertie. Just then the proprietor's son enters. He asks for the meaning of all this, and, when told, he tells the girls to go back to work and reprimands the foreman for his act. The foreman is furious and swears to get revenge.

Trapped.—In his office the foreman plans a trap for Gertie. He sends for her and tells her to go to the garret to get some yarn. She takes the key and exits, slyly followed by the foreman. Hardly has Gertie entered the garret when the foreman steps in and locks the door. In a fight to gain her freedom she falls. The foreman quickly exits and locks the door from the outside. He then returns to his office as if nothing had happened.

Closing Hour. Where Is Gertie?—The girls are ready to go home. They find Gertie's hat and coat, but where is she? They look for her everywhere except in the garret, and at last conclude that she went home.

An Unwilling Witness.—Gertie in the garret has regained her consciousness. Finding herself locked in, she first gives way to tears, but soon concludes to look for her release. She finds in a tool box a hand saw, which she uses to good advantage in sawing the lock out of the door. While running through the stock room she hears steps. It is the foreman, who returned to the factory to get revenge on Gertie. He finds the door open, the lock on the floor. While opening the door to the stock room the wind blows out his light; he strikes a match, lights his lamp and, throwing the burning match into a corner filled with chemicals, causes an explosion which throws him to the floor, whereby he breaks his leg. He drags himself out of the room upstairs, but unable to sustain himself, caused by the great pain, he tumbles unconscious down the steps. Gertie by the glare of the fire takes the extinguisher, with which she tries to down the fire. Just then the firemen, led by the proprietor's son, break through the door and help to extinguish the fire.

"You Brave Little Girl. You Saved My Fortune. Will You Share It With Me?"—The proprietor's son leads Gertie to the office, where she breaks down from nervous strain. He asks the girl, whom he always admired, to share his fortune which she saved with him. Arm in arm they leave the factory. Length, 645 feet.

MAD DOG.—A little boy is walking down the street when a tiny little dog playfully barks at him. He is very much frightened and runs away shouting "Mad dog!" Two ladies take up the cry and run with the boy, screaming at the top of their voices, "Mad dog!" There is great consternation all along the route; people run and do not know from what. The innocent cause of all this trouble runs playfully after the crowd. At last a squad of policemen draw their revolvers, ready to shoot the mad dog, when the little dog comes around the corner wagging its tail. "And the little dog laughed to see such sport." Length, 222 feet.

THE POLICEWOMAN.—This series illustrates the perpetration of a practical joke of a young lady upon her lover. She visits the office of the superintendent of the police and while there dons the uniform of an officer. Thus attired, she passes through the office where her lover, also a friend of the superintendent, is relating his troubles. Out on the street she is called upon to perform the duties of an officer, and this gives rise to several very amusing incidents. Arriving at her home after a number of trying experiences, she is glad of the opportunity to change her attire and return the troubleosme uniform. At the superintendent's office she again meets her lover and both leave, happy again in each other's company. Length, 562 feet.

THE POLITICIAN.—A subject depicting incidents enacted at an election. The candidate for office delivers many speeches and gives many evidences of his good faith in the doctrines and tenets of his party. He proves himself the friend of his constituents and when the election is concluded and he is placed in office his friends all flock to him to hold him to his campaign promises. Length, 361 feet.

UNCLE'S PALM TREE.—Uncle surprises his favorite nephew by a short visit and as a token of regard brings with him a palm tree. The nephew and his wife show their appreciation of the gift by carrying it with them whenever they go out, but it proves the source of much trouble, and when they water it they precipitate a violent encounter with the tenants of the lower flat, resulting in a riot call. They conclude to demolish the plant and are thus engaged when the donor appears and takes serious offense at their apparent insult. When the work of devastation has been completed our friends find out that the plant was only artificial and they grow highly indignant. Length, 406 feet.

BENARES.—A series of views pertaining to life and customs in Benares, India. Length, 456 feet.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

BENEVOLENT EMPLOYER.—An employer receives his men with great cordiality, and when he learns that each suffers from some particular ailment or malady he ministers to their wants. At noon he has luncheon served to them and later grants them leave of absence, and they go to a neighboring saloon to play cards. During the afternoon they threaten to go on strike and are with difficulty induced to remain. Length, 561 feet.

ARABIAN HORSEMEN.—A series of views showing the habits and customs of the Arabian horsemen and giving a good demonstration of their skill in the saddle. Length, 307 feet.

THE SETTLEMENT WORKERS.—A story of a man's regeneration through love, introducing everyday phase of life in New York's great slum district.

Con Connors has been for some years a bouncer and a rough-house fighter, employed by Fatty Walsh, a New York saloon and dance hall proprietor on Cherry street. Con and Shack Dugan, a bouncing boy, are staunch friends and pals. Shack has a sweetheart, Mamie Grogan. Mamie's father objects to Shack, and in our opening scene, which occurs in front of Walsh's saloon, old man Grogan and Shack are prevented from clashing by the timely interference of Con.

Our next scene is the interior of the Baxter street settlement house, and we see our pretty heroine, Mary Deering, dispensing charity to the waiting applicants, assisted by the pastor and matron. A characteristic scene which for faithfulness and careful attention to detail will be found above criticism.

Our next scene shows Walsh's dance hall in full operation. Con again prevents the father of Mamie Grogan from doing bodily harm to her sweetheart. But Grogan bides his time. The scene changes to Cherry Hall, an underground house for the gang. Con is asleep, and the rest of the gang are passing the time playing cards and rushing the growler, but careful not to disturb the slumbers of their leader. In the awakening just outside of Cherry Hall, we see enacted an episode destined to change the current of Con's life and to awaken in him a desire for manhood and honor. Mary Deering is on her way to the Settlement House when she is stopped by a ragged urchin, with a pitiful tale of want and misery. Mary has several bundles in her arms, and after giving the boy some change, in replacing her pocketbook she drops it, but hardly walks a dozen paces before she discovers her loss. Lanky Ann has witnessed the transaction, and also spots the pocketbook. Mary turns just in time to see her pick it up and immediately demands the return of her property. But Ann makes a dive for the door of Cherry Hall with her booty. Mary follows her, and as the two women come down the rickety stairs they are met by a dozen of the worst character of New York's submerged district. "That pocketbook belongs to me," says Mary. "You lie!" yells Ann,

OUR NEW INDEPENDENT FILMS ARE JUST LIKE A GOLD MINE

THE MORE OF THEM WE RELEASE
THE BETTER THEY GET

Every one of our new Independent films are of our own importation and are proving to be the biggest money-making films that are now being exhibited. It is easy to account for this. They are something entirely new, as well as different from the class of films usually shown, and are just what the people to-day demand. If you want to get the people coming your way all you need to do is exhibit these films.

Besides being exact counterfeits of life on the stage, they show real life throbbing and teeming with interest, and are without that sameness usually found in films.

You will find a synopsis of some of them published in this issue of the World, but do not be satisfied with this. Write for the synopsis of them all, and do not forget that one of the biggest attractions at this time is

Our Independent Inauguration Film

Insist upon getting this film only. It is the only perfect one of this great event, and is 100 per cent. better than the pictures taken by the Licensed combine. It is films of this kind that prove the Independent films are the best, and to exhibit it means a great help to you. All of the Inauguration Day Ceremonies are vividly pictured in it, and it can be had only through Independent exchanges. Price per foot, 12 cents.

Don't Sew Yourself Up for a Year

That's exactly what you will do if you sign any kind of a contract the Licensed combine may tender you. You can't afford to bind yourself to exhibit "licensed" films only when you can exhibit them, also the Independent films we are releasing, if you sign nothing. Fact is, if it ever was a matter of dollars and cents with you to remain Independent, it is now. You want films that will pay you best to exhibit, and you certainly have them in our new Independent films.

Project this slide on your screen:

THEY ARE THE BEST
NOT IN TRUST
Write for it. It's Free.

THOUSANDS of dollars are being spent advertising, solely to influence the public to patronize theaters displaying the above signs on their screens, and if you display it as well as advertise that you exhibit only Independent films you are sure to be benefited.

"It's mine! My new beau is just after making me a present." The noise of the altercation arouses Con from a sound sleep. He leaps to his feet with a curse, his arm raised to strike. He meets the eyes of Mary Deering looking defiantly into his own. Something grasps the man's heart; his arm falls to his side. Mary realizes that this dominant personality must be the leader here and at once states her case to him. Con gazes at her like one in a dream, then slowly, without turning to Ann, says, "Gimme that leather." "I went, I found it." But Ann gets no further; the brute in Con has come to the surface, and with a growl of rage his hands have closed around Ann's throat. Mary grasps his arm; "Oh! don't; please don't!" Con, looking into her eyes, releases Ann, takes the pocketbook from her and gives it to Mary, saying, "You are free; go now. Nobody will try to stop you." "Thank you; here is my card, Mr. Con. Connors." Thank you, mum." "Mr. Connors, if you will call at this address my friends will thank you, too." That evening Con thinks of the card and calls on Mary, and is offered a position by the pastor. We next see him installed as watchman at the Settlement House.

The Dawn of Love.—In this scene is provided a genuine scene novelty. A roof garden on top of the Settlement House building, overlooking New York harbor. Here is shown the settlement workers caring for the sick. Pretty Mary is in the foreground, surrounded by a group of children, small human waifs cast adrift on a sea of crime, and but for the services rendered by the settlement workers of our great cities, hundreds of these unfortunates would be lost, that by their aid are placed upon the right road to become honorable, useful men and women. Con finds Mary here, and she is quick to see the change in him, that he, too, is on the right path, and Con realizes in a vague way that "the light that shines in a woman's eyes" is working out his redemption. But his regeneration is not to be wrought out without a struggle. There is a fight. Con saves his friend and escapes from the police. That night he rows the boy to an outgoing schooner bound for the Pacific, and then returns to New York alone. He writes Mary a note, begging her not to lose faith in him entirely, that the future may give him an opportunity of proving his honesty of purpose. An opening offers; a railroad out in Montana needs men too badly to inquire into their past, and Con is given charge of the gang of laborers, and we see him receive his instructions and transportation at the company's offices.

Three years later a bridge is being constructed, and Con, now a contractor, has just arrived to give his orders for the day. The heavy steam drills, the steam riveters, and the busy throng of laborers are all presented actively engaged as the scene opens. There is a premature explosion of dynamite and our hero is carried from the wreckage badly injured. The following morning, in far-away New York, Mary reads in a daily paper these startling headlines:

LANE'S BRIDGE, MONTANA.
Frightful Explosion.
Conway Connors, Contractor, Badly Injured.

Mary's mind is made up; she secures a time-table, and a few hours later, accompanied by the pastor and matron she is on her way to the man she has never ceased to love.

Our closing scene is at the bedside of Con, who is now on the high road to recovery. Mary kneels at his feet, and he sees again the love light in her eyes; he knows that the past is blotted out forever and that the future holds peace and happiness.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

COHEN AT CONEY ISLAND.—Picturing the experiences of Cohen, his wife and the little Cohens on a holiday trip to Coney Island. They visit Steeplechase, Dreamland, Luna Park, and, in fact, take in all of the interesting sights of the pleasure centers; the roulette wheel, soup bowl, shooting the chutes, take a ride on the camel, see the Salome dance, and wind up the day with a plunge in the ocean. Length, 660 feet.

COHEN'S DREAM OF CONEY ISLAND.—A companion picture to "Cohen at Cohen Island." After the strenuous day at the Island, Cohen and his family return home, retire early, and we find Cohen and his wife almost instantly falling asleep. In his dreams Papa Cohen sees all the sights over again. He visits the Egyptian fortune teller, but upon being insulted by the latter, gets into an awful scrap. Then the famous Salome dance, and so on down the line until he has visited every place of interest on the Island. He winds up in Bostock's, where he enters the cage with the animals. They break through the doors, chase him through the streets, and, as they pounce upon him, he wakes up. Cohen takes a couple of matzas from the table, eats them and falls off to pleasant dreams. Another big comic. Length, 295 feet.

THE MAGIC PURSE.—This introduces a mermaid who, like the fairy of the story books, transforms a plain sailorman into a prince for a time. His family do not appreciate his high rank and he discards the charm.

THE NON-STOP MOTOR BICYCLE.—An inexperienced young man receiving instructions in a cycle shop. He then mounts the motor bicycle, which he has been persuaded to buy, and shoots into the street. The machine gets up speed and is soon beyond the rider's control. A man precariously perched on a ladder in position against a street lamp finds his support whisked away, an organ-grinder is brought to the street with his instrument, and in making his way between two perambulators the cyclist brings both to the ground. Next a painting carried by two men is torn to pieces by the rider in his course, and a policeman upset, and the exciting journey ends in the basement of a house, where the young man is drenched with water by the laundresses among whom he had descended and roughly treated by the many persons he has upset and who have followed him into the house.

CENTAUR FILM CO.

THE SCEPTICAL COWBOY.—This film presents a subject based on an actual incident in the West. We see in the first scene a log cabin post-office on the San Pedro River in Arizona, and the postmaster is busy cleaning his gun, while his boy is practising rope spinning. Two cowboys ride up to get their mail, and one of them receives a letter from a friend in Tucson telling him of a great show in town, that Sherman the Great, a magician, is catching bullets fired from guns, and invites him in to see it. His chum is sceptical of this seemingly impossible feat and offers to wager money that it cannot be done. The stakes are placed in the hands of the postmaster, and we next see the cowboys riding to town to see the show. We see their arrival in front of the theater, where they inspect the billboards and follow the crowd into the theater. We then see the interior of the theater, with the magician on the stage performing the usual card and other magic tricks, and then comes the feat of "bullet catching," which the magician apparently succeeds in doing, but the cowboys are sceptical and raise the question as to the genuineness of the bullets, and the magician invites them up to examine them, and after they have examined them they are about to leave the theater in disgust when the magician loses his temper and, calling one of them a "four-flusher," accuses him of trying to break up the show. Thereupon one of the cowboys rushes up on the stage, whips out his six-shooter and says, "If you caught them, catch this one," and fires point blank at the professor, who drops, shot through the heart. The cowboy realizes what he has done in his excitement, and immediately rushes for the exit, accompanied by his chum, but the audience grapple with them and endeavor to hold them for the deed. They manage to fight their way out, and we next see them rushing to their horses, pursued by a policeman who has been apprised of the occurrence and who is joined by another officer, but they are too late to capture the cowboys, who ride away on their horses. Just then an automobile comes upon the scene, which they climb into and order the chauffeur to pursue the cowboys. We then see a most exciting chase, and finally one of the cowboys is wounded and falls from his horse, and the police capture him. His chum refuses to desert his friend in the hour of need, and returns. Being without ammunition, he is also captured. We then see them lodged in prison cells, where one of them is endeavoring to cheer up his chum, and the picture closes with a night scene in the cell of the cowboy that shot the magician. His slumbers seem to be very much disturbed, as he tosses restlessly on his couch, and finally an apparition of the magician appears and, after making threatening gestures at the sleeping cowboy, with a wave of his hand he produces on the wall of the cell a vision of the cowboy's finish, where the cowboy finds himself between the hangman and the sheriff being led to the gallows, the rope placed around his neck, the black cap on his head, and just as he drops in the vision his body rolls from the couch to the floor and the vision disappears, much to his amazement, and we see him fall on his knees in prayer.

We Now Have Independent Motion Picture Films for Rent

THE FINEST MOVING PICTURES IN THE WORLD

Swanson Was The FIRST To Break Away From The Trust

And Save His Customers the $2.00 a Week Royalty

THE MOVING PICTURE TRUST

Requires you to pay a royalty of $2.00 a week on your machine that you have bought and paid for. There are over 12,000 Moving Picture Shows in the United States. This means $1,240,000.00 a year to the TRUST, which will be used as a fund to whip exhibitors into their clutches and then—the rental schedule will be enforced and the dictation as to who can and who cannot operate theatres. Common sense and mature judgment will suggest that you do not fatten up the Trust Film Exchanges.

INDEPENDENT SERVICE MEANS EXCLUSIVE SERVICE and it should be distinctly understood that Moving Picture Exhibitors using the now have at their disposal eighteen to twenty-one carefully selected reels weekly. The product of the European factories is unexcelled and combines the highest degree of photographic perfection with originality of subjects.

Mr. Swanson Will Personally Select all Subjects that are placed in our rental stock and they will be the product of the manufacturers for whom the

INTERNATIONAL PROJECTING AND PRODUCING COMPANY HAVE THE EXCLUSIVE AMERICAN AGENCY

Mr. Swanson has considered the question most carefully, and has investigated very thoroughly the source of supply of film for the Independent Exchanges, and he believes that the subjects which are being placed on the market are unequalled, not only in subject matter, but also in photography, and are the choicest productions of the European manufacturers. We ask that all exhibitors who are interested in securing the highest quality film service write us to-day for particulars.

PREVENTS TIRED EYES AND HEADACHES

The rapidity of our new shutter has been so perfected that 30 to 40 per cent. less non-exposure (which has heretofore caused the tremulous vibration producing so many tired eyes and headaches) is found in the Motiograph than in any other machine, making perfect brilliancy of picture and sharpness of outline. Together with the rocklike steadiness of the pedestal the flicker is thus entirely eliminated.

Five-cent Theatre and Vaudeville-House Managers increase their bank account with the Motiograph. Patrons who come once will always come again where they know they see the best pictures, positively rest their eyes instead of tiring them, and where all fire risks are removed.

The Motiograph

1908 Theatre Model, Especially Approved by the Underwriters Association

OTHER POINTS OF EXCELLENCE IN THE MOTIOGRAPH found in no other machines are: A special Film Rewind by which the film can be rewound with the main crank in two minutes without removing either reels or magazines, saving time between pictures and entertainments; perfected Fireproof Magazines, Fire Traps, with four rollers and with spring actuated flanged guides, preventing side movement and making it impossible for fire to pass them; never failing Automatic Fireproof Shutters; Perfect Framing Device; Flanged Sprocket Rollers to prevent film being torn or ruined by accidentally running off sprocket wheels; Enclosed Gears and working parts; Perfect Take-up with new form of belt adjuster; Lid Off Wide Open Lamp House making it easily accessible; Improved Arc Lamp with all Hand Wheel Adjustments; Slide Carrier Swing, saving one-third more illustration for the Motion Pictures.

The Summers-Britt Fight Pictures

taken at the National Sporting Club in London, England, February 22, 1909, and shown for the first time in America at the Trocadero Theater, Chicago, Ill., week beginning March 14, is now

THE STAR ATTRACTION

AND THE BEST MONEY-MAKER IN THE MOVING PICTURE LINE.

These pictures are the latest and best fight pictures taken. They show with rare fidelity every detail of the five best rounds—the first, second, third, seventh and twentieth—of the remarkable twenty-ronnd battle between Johnny Summers, England's lightweight wonder, and Jimmy Britt, America's former white lightweight champion, as it was fought under English rules before the National Sporting Club, February 22. The price of admission to this performance ranged from $10.00 to $50.00 a seat.

PUBLIC OPINION ON THE PICTURES

The Billboard: "The pictures are clear and show well the live action of the bout."

The Inter-Ocean, one of the leading morning newspapers of Chicago: "The motion pictures of the Summers-Britt fight are now showing in this city, and are attracting large crowds. They are on exhibtion at the Trocadero, and have played to capacity each afternoon and evening."

The Chicago American, perhaps the best authority in America on pugilistic matters: "The fight was one of the best and fastest seen in some time. The pictures have made quite a hit here, as doubtless they will in other sections of the country when shown."

What the World's Champion Fighters Say:

Battling Nelson, lightweight champion of the world: "They are the clearest and most active fight pictures I have ever seen. There isn't any of that loafing that one sees in so many of the motion pictures of ring battles. For speed the fight is a peach."

Jack Johnson, heavyweight champion of the world. "The fight is a grand one and the pictures are clear and full of action."

Stanley Ketchel, middleweight champion of the world. "It was a grand fight and the pictures ought to take well throughout the country."

I. Weingarten, manager of the Trocadero Theatre, who paid $350.00 for the first week's use of the pictures says: "Price considered, the Summers-Britt fight pictures was one of the best paying special features I ever had."

It is a battle full of life and action, the men mixing from gong to gong, not an idle moment—just the kind of fight every lover of sport in your town will gladly pay you an extra admission price to see fought over again on a screen in your theatre. Length of film is 1,050 feet.

An interesting feature of the fight is shown when Eugene Corri, the wealthy stockbroker who refereed the bout, so far forgot tradition as to climb into the ring and Americanize the game.

By a special arrangement made with John Krone, of Chicago, these fight pictures can be secured only through the Chicago Film Exchange.

The Arnolds are spending their vacation in the Alps when Mr. Rogers visits them with the intention of pressing his suit for the hand of Jeanne. At the same time a telegram from Marcel announces the latter's intentions to spend a holiday with his friends.

The two young men are in love with Jeanne, but Jeanne has a decided preference for the suave young officer and does not lose an opportunity to display her wishes—whereas the parents look very kindly upon Mr. Rogers.

The following day the entire party arrange for an excursion to the mountain peaks. Mr. Rogers in vain endeavors to conceal his chagrin over the fact that Jeanne and the lieutenant find opportunity for exchange of meaning glances.

Arrived at the summit of the mountain, all are in ecstasies over the beauty of the panorama. Jeanne sees a wild flower she would like to have and Marcel does not hesitate to attempt to secure it for her. Unfortunately he slips and falls over the ledge. Guides promptly come to the rescue and find Marcel caught in a fissure not far below; a rope is lowered and fastened about him, but when he is near the top a jealous passion overcomes Rogers and he makes an effort to cut the rope on which Marcel is supported over the gulf. His rash act is prevented by the quick interception of Jeanne.

Rogers' folly causes his disgrace. The young officer wins the approval of the Arnolds and his engagement to pretty Jeanne is soon announced.

Editorial.

Many of the cities are agitating for the introduction of ordinances forbidding the presence of children under a certain age to attend moving picture shows and similar exhibitions. The only point of disagreement lies in the precise age itself. Some cities will have it as low as 10, others as high as 16; in any case the Moving Picture World cordially supports any proposition which would act as a deterrent on children wasting time in moving picture theaters or other places of entertainment which should be passed in the pursuit of education or other desirable pursuits. But we deprecate the foolish nonsense said about the picture shows being more of an incitement to wrong doing than a candy store or any other public place. Wrong doing with the juvenile or the adult is more of a matter of opportunity than of place. We are surprised at any intelligent minister of the Gospel or publicist urging otherwise.

American producers are complaining bitterly against the "take it or leave it" conditions which govern the supply of raw stock. This all the more surprises us when we consider the reputation of the great corporation which supplies this material for their up-to-date business policy and progressive methods. We learn that large quantities of negative film has been supplied to manufacturers within the past month which has proved to be so defective as to be absolutely useless and which has lost much valuable time and opportunities which can not be redeemed. For the producer to have to stand this loss, without the privilege of looking elsewhere for his supply, is a condition that augurs ill for the welfare of the business in general and it certainly places the licensed manufacturer in a position where the advantages of being furnished with licensed stock are doubtful, to say the least. There is more than one available source of supply and the task of the producer is so strenuous and exacting that, in the interest of self-preservation and progress, he should be free to purchase whatever stock is best suited to his requirements.

The Clergy and the Moving Picture.

Two weeks ago we rebuked the press of the United States for its absurdly illiberal and ignorant attitude towards the moving picture. Our article, we are pleased to say, has not been without effect. Now it is the turn of the clergy to fall under our lash. We are not disposed to deal so tenderly with them as with our brethren of the press, for, unlike the gentlemen of the Fourth Estate, they cannot plead ignorance. In fact, your cleric or clerk, as he was known in the Middle Ages, is, or should be, above all things, a man of education, to qualify him for his holy office of teaching and directing the poor and ignorant in the way they should go. Pity it is that there should prevail such a pathetic lack of this education amongst the clerical opponents of the moving picture, not only in New York City, but in the other large cities of the Union. Our press clippings recently, we regret to say, have largely consisted of violent attacks on the moving picture, emanating from clergymen who have not scrupled to impute much of the wickedness it is their mission to neutralize to the influence of a moving picture on a sheet of linen! It seems to us that they have gone out of their way to seek evil in a novel place, just as if Satan had decided to put all his maleficient influence in a moving photograph.

Was ever such an exhibition of blind fanaticism, to use the mildest phrase, displayed by clergymen as that which America has recently witnessed, emanating from such distinguished divines as Canon Chase, Dr. Foster, Father Cassidy, Archbishop Farley, Rev. R. V. Hunter of Buffalo, and others whose names we charitably suppress? To take the New York clergymen's position: Are they aware that at times during the closing opera season, what seemed to be a partially clothed woman was allowed to outrage public decency upon the stage in the character of Salome? Why did not Canon Chase and Dr. Foster denounce this form of indecency? Is the well-fed opera patron to be permitted to satiate his appetite for sensuality unrebuked and uncondemned, whilst the poor man is not to be permitted to look upon a moving photograph of a similar exhibition? We applaud neither. Indecency is indecency whether it be at the Manhattan Opera House or at a Bowery moving picture show. But surely the clergymen know that example is stronger than precept and that the manners of the poor are largely imitative of those of the rich.

Gentlemen of the pulpit, you are doing your work at the wrong end. The moving picture show can take care of itself, is taking care of itself, for the very simple reason that manufacturers and others are finding out that in the long run cleanliness of subject, especially amongst the poor, pays best. What evil there has been, has been exaggerated. The harm inflicted by the clergy on the business has been incalculable. In fact, we look upon Canon Chase and his confreres as responsible for much misery and loss. Our pages bear witness to the thoroughness with which the censorship of films is being carried out all over the country. Now we hope that as these reverend gentlemen find their occupation of playing Aunt Sally with the moving picture is gone, they will leave it alone and in future not insult their readers and their congregations by these uncalled for attacks. If, however, Canon Chase and Dr. Foster and their brethren are anxious to improve the shining hour in the way of deodorizing public entertainments, we call their attention to a list of questionable "legitimate" plays in last week's World upon which they can preach any number of pointed sermons.

By Thomas Bedding, F. R. P. S.

CHAPTER IV.

Exposure.

The exposure of moving picture films seems, as far as I can discover, to rest pretty much on guesswork. There is room for more science in the matter—for the elimination of that very uncertain factor, personal judgment. Consider, for a moment, the factors that have to be employed. There is first a sensitive film, the aperture of the lens, the actinic value of the light on the subject, the distance of the latter from the lens, the amount of shadow there is in it. Supposing we are working in an illuminant such as daylight, are these factors constant? We may standardize the lens by always working it with a fixed opening. The distance of the stage and the figures on it may be immovable. But what of the sensitiveness of the film and the power of the light? Seldom is the former known, and the latter varies almost every minute of the day. Now, here we have the two great elements of uncertainty which make every kind of photography pure conjecture, so long as those uncertainties are allowed to have play. The sensitiveness of the film and the actinic value of the light being known, it is obvious that the chief factors in the exposure of moving picture photographs can be so utilized as to make exposure a matter of arithmetical certainty. So, taking roughly about 20 exposures a second as the average, an accelerated or retarded motion of the hand is all that is necessary if the proper sequence of these factors is to govern the greater or less rapidity of exposure.

Of course, I know that moving picture photograph makers, like most professioinal photographers, jeer at exposure by rule. This is because they are ignorant of the first principles of the subject. I have known of a most pathetic waste of film by under or over exposure, but it can be directly traced to the assurance of the operator who can always "tell" what exposure to give. He may guess, but he cannot tell. The man is not born that can do such a thing. Who can tell what the sensitiveness of the film is without testing it, or estimate what the actinic value of daylight is without testing it? Of course, negative film is comparatively cheap, and the loss or waste of a few thousand feet a year may not make a vital difference in a prosperous moving picture business, but by and by, when competition becomes keener, as it is sure to do, this question of waste will be a serious one. At present far too much negative film is spoiled by guessing at the exposure and producing a kind of negative which it does not pay to doctor.

I am not prepared to give a definite system for working this end of the business, but I can insist on certain fixed principles, the observance of which should do much towards systematizing the production of the photograph. In the first place film of uniform and known sensitiveness should be used; it should never be used unless it has been tested for these two qualities. Not that I uggest that the film chiefly used in the United States is not always good. It probably is and possibly it does not vary, but I want the man who is responsible for the exposure or the development to find this out for himself; to test each batch of film before it is exposed and get an idea of its sensitiveness to the light used. By such means he can approach towards standardizing factor number one.

Then with regard to the lens aperture. He should know what relation this is to the focal length of the combination, and it should be made a constant factor. The actinic value of the light should be measured on printing-out paper or under some kind of sensitometer, or reference should be made to the Burroughs Wellcome Exposure Tables, which give film sensitiveness, light sensitiveness and other accurate data that will enable the photographer to know exactly what he is doing in the matter. And then, again, the hand is a very fallacious instrument to rely upon for measuring purposes, like the eye or ear. Some means should be chosen for accurately measuring off the rate of progression of the film, so that we may get down to an approach towards automatic exposure, instead of employing the haphazard system so commonly in vogue.

Conservative photographers who are working in the moving picture business will possibly smile at these suggestions and dismiss them as rather transcendental, but that will not alter their practical value. I have had much to do, for many years, with the scientific end of photography, especially in its standardizing aspects, and I have lived to see numerous protegés, who once derided my advice, admit their error, and adopt it. One of these days we shall expose and develop moving pictures just as automatically as we expose and develop bromide prints, an achievement once looked upon as impracticable, and we shall begin to make progress when the moving picture maker realizes that it is quite possible to standardize studio exposures, make them accurately, and so avert uncertainty, and avoid failure at the beginning of the work. To enter fully into the subject of exposure of sensitive films would require more space than the "World" can afford for this part of the theme, but for anyone who is desirous of taking up the scientific study of the matter, I refer him to the writings of Alfred Watkins and Sir William Abney, which are obtainable through the usual scientific book sellers. Meanwhile, I will conclude by reiterating the advice to regulate the exposure of moving picture films as far as practicable by ascertaining definitely the factorial values of the sensitive film, lens aperture, light, distance and nature of subject. These being known, the accurate estimation of the exposure becomes an arithmetical problem of no great difficulty, and the use of which should at any rate minimize failure by lessening the margin of error.

We are determined, whenever occasion offers, to anathematise the incompetent eight-dollar-a-week "operator" who goeth abroad like a roaring ass seeking whom he may delude as to his possession of abilities within which he has not yet got into speaking distance. He is an opportunist "crank turner" and that alone; ignorant of the simple laws of mechanics, optics and electricity; and trusting to luck to get some sort of a result on the screen, which he does. Such a "result" only this week gave us the eye-ache in looking at ill-adjusted, out of focus, partially eclipsed pictures on the screen. Every exhibition of this kind does harm to the business, and we appeal to exhibitors to only engage the services of men who critically demonstrate their abilities to run a projector. It is an open question whether it is not the parsimony of the exhibitor that is to blame for these crank turners.

The Board of Censorship,

composed of a committee from various civic organizations, have established themselves in offices at 96 Fifth avenue, New York City, with N. Joseph Slicklen as secretary.

To the Manufacturers Again.

Last week we printed an editorial in which we urged manufacturers to be alive to the fact that they were confronted with keen competition in the respect of the qualities, photographic and dramatic, of their films. We would like to say that whatever is written on this subject in our pages is backed up by intimate knowledge of all the practical phases of the work. This is not the case of an ordinary journalist handling a subject with which he is perfunctorily acquainted. No; the World criticisms proceed from hands that have made and produced many moving photographs, that have supervised their preparation and production, and generally are in touch with all the minutiæ of the subject. Indeed, we may say, that it is rare that a journal is so well equipped as is this for handling the technical aspects of moving picture making.

We want to supplement our remarks of last week by drawing in extraneous evidence of the truth of what we urged from a source that commands unquestionable respect in the American entertainment world. We allude to the New York Dramatic Mirror, a paper that deals with the drama in an intelligent and level-headed way. A section of this paper is devoted to criticisms of film subjects and from its last week's issue, we take the liberty of quoting some of the remarks on subjects that have recently been released. We commend those criticisms to the manufacturers concerned. They justify the attitude we have so long taken, that there is room for improvement in the dramatic quality of the pictures produced by manufacturers whose work, unfortunately, within the last few days has been stamped as "perfect." It is far from that, and the sooner the fact is recognized and a wholesale reform in method is adopted, the sooner we believe will American manufacturers be in a position to defy competition. They certainly are not at present.

(From the Dramatic Mirror, April 3, 1909.)

"Not By Such Pictures That the Superiority of Licensed Pictures Over the Independent Output Is to be Demonstrated."

"A Cry from the Wilderness" (Edison, March 26).—This picture was evidently made by the Edison company in the wilds of Canada during the Winter, and some of the scenes possess wierd beauty that is not to be denied, but the story is so vaguely constructed and acted, and the photography so obscure, taken in snow scenes with the different characters impossible to recognize, that there might as well be no plot or story so far as the spectator is concerned. We see an Esquimau village and a fight with a white trader; a vacant house in the wilderness; a murderous assault on the trader by an Esquimau; another man on horseback pursuing this Esquimau; this man killed by the Esquimau; another Esquimau rescuing the first wounded man, and the Esquimau murderer pursued by other Esquimaus, and disappearing over a precipice, and finally the marriage of the trader to an Esquimau girl. If anybody can piece together a story out of such material he can do more than the writer of this review. To make matters worse, the picture is full of inconsistencies in detail, such as white underclothes on an Esquimau baby, people freely using their bare hands in the bitter cold that is supposed to prevail, a man on horseback in the Esquimau country and a helpless, wounded man being dragged on a sled over rough country without being fastened to the sled and without any attempt to protect him from the cold. There is also unnecessary exhibition of blood and gore when the wounded trader is found by the rescuing Esquimau. It is not by such pictures as this one that the superiority of licensed pictures over the Independent output is to be demonstrated.

"Weak and Unreasonable."

"The Day of the Dog" (Lubin, March 22).—We had hopes in viewing the early part of this picture that we were to have an interesting and plausible story. It starts in well, with a a young machinist and his sweetheart working in the same factory and making love to each other at their noonday lunch. The machine shop is faithfully represented and the love making is pleasingly acted, but the story that follows is weak and unreasonable.

"Worse Than Silly."

"Mr. Pallet Goes Landscaping" (Urban-Eclipse, March 24.—The only commendable thing about this picture is the beautiful scenery that Mr. Pallet tries to paint. The alleged comedy is worse than silly. The artist is interrupted each time he sits down to work, but the incidents are far from humorous.

"A Film That Means So Little."

"Strolling Players" (Edison, March 23).—Doubtless there is an interesting story in this picture, but unfortunately we are unable to get at it. A band of strolling players, probably in England, are seen rehearsing and giving an entertainment on the porch of a public inn. One of the players abuses his wife, but we are not able to tell all the time whether the abuse is intended to be real or is only a part of the play they are performing. A lord falls in love with the actress and there is some sort of mix up in letters that pass between them, but we defy even the actors themselves to explain just what the mix up is. It is a pity there should have been so much expense to produce a film that means so little. As the Mirror has before now remarked, Edison pictures should stand for the best in America. Sometimes they approach this standard. Too often they fall far short of it.

"Fails to Hold the Interest of the Spectators."

"King Lear" (Vitagraph, March 27).—The commendable ambition of the Vitagraph Company to adequately produce classical plays in motion picture pantomime, is not as happily realized in this subject as in previous efforts along the same line. King Lear is not an easy subject to handle, and we think the Vitagraph adapters have made the mistake of trying to adhere too closely to the book, instead of taking only the principle incidents of the plot and making these clear in a connected story. The result is that the picture fails to hold the interest of the spectators. The costumes and scenery are faithfully represented, but the photography is dim in parts.

"Unusually Senseless."

"Jolly Sports" (Pathe, March 26).—We must confess our inability to see anything at all humorous in this class of "comics." This picture, in particular, is unusually senseless. A clownish young fellow starts out to destroy things and gets himself into trouble with no motive nor excuse. He breaks dishes, bottles, eggs and other things, and finally lands in a barrel of tar, where we could have hoped he might remain forever. But he gets out and goes home, and we suppose he will bob up again in some other picture—bad luck to him!

THE MOVING PICTURE OUT WEST.

In an interview with B. R. Craycroft, president and general manager of the Crescent Amusement Company of Texas and Mexico, who has recently passed through New York, we learn that the moving picture out West is regarded as a most elevating amusement. It is looked upon there as far higher than in the East. In California and Oregon society people take their children to see the pictures, for they rank a moving picture house quite as highly as they do the ordinary theater. Dramatic films are chiefly in demand. Generally we learn there is now a better class of people patronizing the moving picture theater. There are some fine moving picture houses in Denver and Los Angeles; in Seattle also the moving picture business is very good. In the Central West, blood and thunder subjects are not popular; in Oregon, however, they go well; in Colorado, too, the more intensely dramatic the subject the better. In the South, like the Middle West, they prefer comedy subjects. In Mexico such a subject as "Othello" would draw 30 to 40 per cent. of the patrons to moving picture theaters, but murderous and bull-fight subjects will draw 100 per cent. of them. From all this it would appear that local conditions in the moving picture business demand close study and that the productions of manufacturers appeal to many publics.

FAMOUS CAMERA ACTRESS IN AMERICA.

Miss Anna Quintaro, who was formerly leading lady for several Italian film manufacturers, is now in America. She has been engaged for the stock company of J. J. Murdock, in Chicago.

OBSERVATIONS BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

In answer to the question, "What is new in the moving picture field?" one can given only the brief and truthful answer, "Nothing particular." Aside from the Board of Censors' operation the past week there have not been any developments so far as the Greater New York field is concerned that can excite any extended comments. Many developments are assuming shape, but at this time the affairs are too crude or indefinite to allow publication.

But, say, listen! Do you know that the New York Board of Censors is not the bug-a-boo so many thought it to be, after all? The manufacturers, or at least a majority of them, and a great many of the film renters and exhibitors, thought that the creation of the Board of Censors would start the pealing of the bell which would finally sound the death knell of the moving picture business upon the prohibition of the Sunday exhibitions. "We will never be able to make pictures to meet their requirements," said the manufacturers. "We will never be able to get enough pictures of the kind they demand to supply our customers," exclaimed the film renters. The cry of the exhibitors was that if they were to be restricted to Biblical and travel subjects for their shows they would soon be obliged to go out of business. But, bless your dear hearts, your judgments have been working on the wrong tip. The actions of the Board have thus far been a most agreeable surprise and it is working in perfect harmony with the manufacturers. The sentiments of the Board were put most elegantly and effectively by one of its members, Mrs. Josephine Redding, when she said: "It would be a most terrible calamity if the moving picture shows were abolished, or even materially abridged."

I had the pleasure of an advantage to glance over a copy of the first report made by the Board of Censors and was exceedingly pleased at the frank, fair and liberal spirit it reflected. This report was based upon an inspection of about 18,000 feet of new subjects, which was made at the Board's first session. Of this large amount of film but two ubjects, which did not aggregate 1,000 feet, were condemned in their entirety. The report was complete and thoroughly comprehensive. In cases where films were condemned as a whole, reasons were given in clear language for the action. The report was not argumentative. The Board simply pointed out where the film was objectionable in part, or as a whole. In the latter cases the withholding of the subjects was more suggested than directed, but nevertheless one could read between the lines that the Board expected to have its condemnation respected. In cases where films were objectionable in part, or parts, the Board suggested changes in the nature of substitutions of scenes to carry out the story in a manner that would not meet objections. The Board also took occasion to state that it proposed to call everything by its proper name and that if anything immoral should be found it would be labeled as such. An appeal was also made to the manufacturers to give all the attention possible to art in their work.

This reminds me of the appeal that is being made by many writers for better quality in the manufacture of the pictures, and in most of the appeals the aim appears to be at the American manufacturers. The term quality has a broad scope. It covers the quality of the raw stock used, the quality and use of the various chemicals, the work of the camera and the camera man, the weather conditions, the scenic surroundings of both exterior and interior, the costuming and work of the performers, the development, printing and final make-up of the film; and, I might add, the construction, conception and carrying out of the story. When quality is referred to, all these things flash through the mind and all these things must be borne in mind and given the closest attention when a film that may lay full claim to quality is to be produced. It will be seen that making moving pictures is not as easy a task as grinding sausages out of a machine. Most of the complainants do not speak of quality in the broad sense that has been referred to. They speak more generally of the photographic quality, and I must agree with them that in the past, and in many instances at present, foreign films have excelled the domestic productions. It should be remembered, however, that the American manufacture is in its infancy and those who have given quality serious consideration are making rapid strides toward perfection. I have seen some very poor quality in several foreign films within a recent period. It was evident that the imperfections were due to circumstances that are met with by all makers at some period or another, and I have known the same state of affairs to exist in connection with certain American productions, but the makers were given no allowance on this score.

During the past three weeks a decided improvement in photographic quality has been shown by several of the domestic makers. One thing that would improve some productions would be the abolishment of hand-painted (on canvas) house furnishings. Sometimes a talented painter gets a good thing in a picture and the audience looks more than once to determine whether or not a piece of furniture is the real thing or not, but it ruins a picture to have an amateur sign painter decorate a drop to represent his idea of what a regal apartment in the St. Regis looks like. It makes the chills run up one's back to see a massive piece of mahogany furniture fluttering in the breeze. This kind of work can only be called mistaken economy or inexcusable negligence.

I received a letter this week which I submit in order that my answer to it may be fully understood:

"Man About Town,
"Moving Picture World,
"New York City.

"Dear Sir—Will you let me know if the Board of Aldermen of your city have adopted the resolution they had before them to raise the exhibitors' license fee and stop Sunday exhibitions? Also please let me know if there is a bill before the New York Legislature to prohibit the Sunday exhibitions.

"INTERESTED."

The Board of Aldermen have not adopted the resolution referred to, nor any other bearing upon moving pictures. The matter is still under advisement. Appearances indicate a disposition on the part of the Aldermen to go slow in adopting any measure that might be considered radical by many of their constituents. A bill has been sent to the Legislature regarding the prohibition of exhibitions on Sundays, but the bill does not apply alone to moving pictures. It has been framed to cover all Sunday exhibitions, entertainments, concerts, etc. If I have correctly caught the trend of thought on the part of the supporters of the bill the issue is to be "one wrong, all wrong."

The writer is not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, but will take a chance of being chided at some future date for attempting to pose as one. Cut this out and place it in your hat: If the exhibitors observe the laws, conduct their places and their shows as they should be, and allow themselves to be guided by men in the business who frequently display cooler and better judgment, better diplomacy and more good faith which many exhibitors frequently fail to show, many of the dreads that have caused so much anxiety for weeks past will be dispelled. It would not be surprising if opposition to even Sunday exhibitions would die out.

It is not intended to boost the exhibitors' association unnecessarily or for any shielded motive when all the exhibitors are advised to become members of that association. It pays them to join the organization if only to keep posted on what is going on in the business that is of such vital importance. It is a safe bet that the correspondent I have replied to is not a member. If he was he would not have written me. All the association members know all that is going on and it must be acknowledged that they appear to be in excellent spirits as compared with those who are not in touch with the association and cannot, therefore, learn what is being done in behalf of those who are members.

THE KIMBLE ELECTRIC CO. HAS SOLVED THE PROBLEM FOR VENTILATING MOTION PICTURE THEATERS.

The point is being agitated that theaters should be ventilated, but the question arises how to do away with the everlasting humming of the fan? The Kimble people come to the rescue with a fan that is absolutely noiseless. Their fan has speeds from 80 to 700 revolutions per minute, controlled by two hanging chains, any gradation of speed, between the maximum and the minimum, can be had. See their announcement on page 407.

This fan is usually run at high speed during intermission and reduced to a lower speed during the performance, thus keeping a constant circulation of pure air. The cost of running this fan is greatly reduced because the current consumption is in direct ratio with the speed and power. It is very simply constructed and shipped in one piece, all ready to be installed. A child could run it, as it is stopped, started and regulated by the two chains. These chains can be put in the operator's booth or at any place desired.

TO THE EXHIBITORS.

In my travels I have found that the country exhibitors are more wide-awake than the city exhibitors. This seems unreasonable, nevertheless it is so and may be accounted for by the fact that most of the country shows are managed by local business men—men who know how to advertise, know how to dress their store windows, etc., while the city shows are under the management of exhibitors who believe in posters.

When a country exhibitor wishes to announce a special film, he does not order numerous large and ugly posters to blockade the sidewalks or spoil the appearance of his building, but he takes a pride in arranging a neat exhibition in his lobby. If the film is a Western story, he tries to have a man or two dressed as cowboys and keep them pacing in front of his place, while in the lobby, in front of the ticket office, he will arrange some saddles, guns, etc. If it is an Indian film, he will have Indians, etc. In historic films, he will have guns, flags, tents, men dressed in the uniforms of the times, etc.

In a small town, in a theater where they were showing the "American Fleet at Sidney," the exhibitor had at the entrance of his place a man dressed as a United States sailor and one as a United States marine, while in the center of the lobby he had flags, guns, arms, ammunition, etc. This display caught the eye of the public and, as an advertising medium, was far more effective than posters.

Such displays are getting very popular and there is no doubt that New York will follow, as Philadelphia has already fallen in line and I am confident that the Board of Censorship will approve such displays in lieu of the ugly and highly sensational posters now so much in view.

If you want to draw the trade, please the eye and you will succeed. If it was not so, our storekeepers would not spend so much money to dress their windows; but they have found by experience that a well dressed window brings more business than glaring signs.

The drawback is that, especially in the country, they do not know where to go for such arms and costumes; they have to borrow the goods from private parties or send to theatrical costumers.

If some of the readers of this paper wish to adopt this new scheme of advertising their feature films, they will be pleased to know that by sending 15 cents to Mr. Francis Bannerman, 501 Broadway, New York, they will receive a fully illustrated catalogue of some 250 pages, in which they will find everything from the spears of the savages to the most modern firearms, from the costumes of a Japanese warrior, or of the Indian, to the modern navy and army uniforms of all the nations. As to prices, they will be surprised to find out that they can make a very fine display at a comparatively small cost.

We can also recommend Messrs. Dreifus & Co., of 12 South Second street, Philadelphia, Pa., for army and navy goods of all descriptions.

"NAPOLEON—THE MAN OF DESTINY."

In many respects this is the most remarkable, the most bold and the most perfect of the Vitagraph series of historical and classic dramas. It is remarkable for the fidelity with which it depicts the scenes in the life of Napoleon that are handed down to us by the great masters and which hang in the art galleries of every great city, also for the fidelity with which is represented the throne room and other relics which are still preserved by the French nation. It is bold in that an American firm has undertaken to produce the principal incidents in the life of the greatest emperor of a nation that claims to lead the world in cinematographic art. It is the most perfect in that the characters for the leading parts have been carefully chosen and perform their parts with dignity and force. It ought to be mentioned that it was to secure accurate data for the scenario of this film that Mr. Blackton, of the Vitagraph Company, made a recent trip to France; and it will require the sale of many copies of the film to cover the cost of the special scenery required to produce it. The production shows a marked improvement over the cramped stage work that marred the effect of much work done in their old studio. The photography is excellent. With one exception we would have liked to see more of each scene, especially the final one, and this is more than can be said of many films. The character of Napoleon is a part of the education of every individual and the film which is issued this week deserves a longer and wider run than is the fate of good and bad productions alike, under the present system of daily change.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

The New York representative of The Billboard is to be pitied. He finds it necessary in his paper to deny the rumor that he acted as press agent of the Motion Picture Patents Company. Mr. Macdonald, the manager of the company, also telegraphed to The Billboard company: "So-and-So is not now, nor ever was, in our employ." So there you are, gents; the man never attached himself to the Motion Picture Patents Company while representing The Billboard. He SAYS so. He ought to know. Macdonald says so. HE ought to know. The proprietors of The Billboard and the public are satisfied, it is to be presumed, that there has been a storm in a tea-cup.

But how did the rumor and the necessity for its denial rise? I know. The man has a double. It was this double who worked at the Motion Picture Patents Company's office, 80 Fifth avenue, New York City, from and after last February 25th; it was this double who interviewed callers, signed advertisement orders, sent out press news, and sat in the room adjoining Macdonald's. It was this double who did these and other things not necessary to particularise now. Poor man, you ARE to be pitied. Goodness only knows what terrible things your double may be doing at this moment, and for which you must suffer! Why, an entire issue of The Billboard may not suffice for the explanations and telegrams demanded of you!

When is the Bianchi camera likely to materialise? It is, so far as I can judge, a clever workable device, and the patent is sound. There should be no lack of capital, in the present stage of the moving picture game, for making and exploiting it. Patents fortunately do not last forever, and there are some upon which much stress has recently been laid which are probably due to run out and be available for all the world to use. The International Projecting and Producing Company might well give this aspect of matters some attention. Also an inquiry into dates and titles might not be thrown away. Nobody seems to have thought of this. Could not the Film Service Association—if it exists—spend another $1,000—if it has the money—to put a sharp patent lawyer on the business?

Said I not truly last week that the censors were getting busy? My word! They'll soon get tired of many doses of 18,000 feet of film unless I'm much mistaken. It's a subject for the facile pencil of the rising young artist whose work lightened the pages of last week's World. I wonder if the censors would object to a moving picture of Maude Allan almost in puris naturalibus, or Mary Garden as Salome, or Gertrude Hoffman as ditto, or Mrs. Leslie Carter as Zaza, or Olga Nethersole as Sappho, or the Rhine Maidens of Wagner, or Leda and the Swans? Would you, Mr. Collier? If so, why? And if not, why not? What about a moving picture of the bedroom scene from "The Girl from Rectors?" Do tell, Mr. Collier.

"It is our intention to put the motion picture show on a basis with the very highest class of theatrical performances from every standpoint." So said the official communique of the Patents company last week. Then we may shortly hope to see good plays, sketches, comedies, dramas properly written, produced, rehearsed and acted, on all licensed films? If you are going to compete with high-class theatrical performances you must employ the some kind of material, just as Messrs. Pathe do in France. There is no other way of doing the work. I welcome the news. So will many others.

Then: "We have long realized the tremendous educational possibilities of the motion picture (so have I gents!) . . . appealing as it does to the . . . poor and the schoolchildren; accordingly we are working to make all future films of an educational and cleanly amusing type." Never mind the educational aspect, gents; stick to the cleanly amusing side. As I said last week, we—that is, the common people, of whom I am one—do NOT want education or edification in a moving picture theatre. "We want entertainment and amusement. The moving picture theater is neither a church nor a school." I welcome the co-operation of the Patents company in carrying out my policy; but if they are going to educate, edify or instruct me, I shall be compelled to dispense with that co-operation. So I hope they will try to amuse me.

"The day of the dingy room picture show has passed and gone." Another quotation from the same source; and more good news, if even it be somewhat unoriginal and old in intention. Evidently we are in for the moving picture millennium. First class plays well photographed and shown in handsome houses sanitarily certificated! Does it not all read like a beautiful gorgeous dream. I'm not making fun of the scheme; I applaud it and will back it up; only—only—only I'm just a LEETLE bit sceptical of its easy accomplishment unless individual manufacturers fall into line and only engage the services of high grade play writers, producers and photographers. Have they agreed to do so?

Look at last week's World. One reader adversely criticises the military details of a recently issued subject, another denounces a gorilla and woman theme, another objects to bad acting, another to poverty of subject; finally, the "Comments on Film Subjects" are full of critical objections to the photographic and productional qualities of recent films. All these subjects, mark you, are made by the "ten greatest film manufacturers in the world," whose pictures are officially stamped as "perfect" by the censors. Still it is comforting to learn that shortly results will be shown which "will gratify the most exacting critics." Delighted!

MOVING PICTURES IN NATURAL COLORS.

The Latest Process.

The patent specification of the latest process for making moving pictures in natural colors has been published. The inventors are W. Friese Greene and the Friese Greene Patents Company of London. According to the specification the inventors claim the use of a color-screen, or a series of screens in the form of a translucent film, which may be in the shape of an endless band, caused to travel in contact with the sensitised film between it and the lens, so that the rays pass through it before reaching the sensitive surface; or a film of the same length as that on which the photograph is taken may be used.

The translucent screen is divided into sections, each of which is the same in size as the picture, and operated by the same mechanism which moves the sensitive film in the camera. The successive sections of the translucent film are colored, red, green, and blue-violet. From the negatives so obtained, positives are printed in the usual way, and the projecting apparatus is supplied with the same translucent film through which the negative was taken, or with one similar to it.

For stereoscopic work, when two lenses and two color-screens are used the inventors state that it is preferable to so arrange the screens that the primary colors do not correspond on the two screens at any one exposure.

Alternative methods of coloring the screens in bands or divisions are also indicated, by which means one part of the picture is taken through one color while another part is taken through another color.

This is a very ingenious method of getting over the difficulty of using detachable color filters in taking the negatives and producing the positives in moving picture color photography, and we should like to see it worked out to a practical result. The patent, however, is somewhat lacking in details necessary to enable us to appraise its real value. It is not stated what dyes are used or what process the manufacturer will follow in the preparation of the translucent films; nor is it clear how the exposures would be adjusted; nor is it clear how two films can be made to travel through the machine together. Moreover, the cost of such a process would, in our opinion, be prohibitive, as it would mean at least tripling the cost of the film throughout. We offer these criticisms in no carping spirit, but rather with the idea of helping the inventors to understand that the first essentials in working any process for producing moving pictures in natural colors is that it shall be readily adaptable to an existing plant. This process is not.

"PERFECT."

The most recent advertisement of the Motion Picture Patents Company announced that all new films, licensed by the Motion Picture Patents Company, have been "pronounced perfect by the Board of Censorship." Presumably the Board of Censorship is identical in constitution with that announced in our last week's issue. These consist of Prof. Charles Sprague Smith, of the People's Institute; John Collier, Mrs. Josephine Redding, editor of Vogue; Albert Shields, District Superintendent of Public Schools on the lower East Side, and N. Joseph Slicklen, official secretary to the censors, together with the censors of the Motion Picture Patents Company. We venture to suggest that the persons named, whatever their views on morals and ethics are, are no authorities on the technique of moving picture films, being without the necessary photographic, constructive and producing experiences. With regard to the company's censors, we must per force be silent, as we do not know their names. Would it not be well to publish them, so that the public might know under whose authority a film is being stamped with the hall mark of perfection? We think that this is a case for a little more publicity.

FROM THE KICKER.

It is an easy thing to amuse an audience or to draw tears from the most stoic spectators, but the public does not want to be deceived.

The spectators do not wish to work up their passions to find that they have exerted themselves for nothing—that the picture is a fake.

"A Cry from the Wilderness" is one of the best examples to demonstrate how some of the films are unreal. We see the Esquimaux with their snow huts, their dogs, their sleighs; we see them walk, run and jump in the deep snow, and everything is so natural that we believe we are transported to Greenland, and we wonder how the manufacturers can bear such great expenses. We see a stone church surrounded by a stone wall, some woods, trees, bushes, etc., but such things, although not to be found in the polar regions, are not too perceptible to the eye of the casual spectator, as he is too wrapped in the dramatic part of the play, the fight and the stabbing of one of the Esquimaux.

This untruthfulness of the scenery would have passed unnoticed, as the attention of the audience was entirely riveted on the emotional fight, if the manufacturers had not brought to the rescue of the wounded man one of General Bingham's fine mounted policemen.

This was too much for the good, willing audience. The blue uniform and brass buttons stamped the picture as a fake. The good women who had already tears streaming down their cheeks at the sight of the supposed agony of the victim, quickly dried up their eyes and did not enjoy the joke of weeping for nothing.

"Across the Border" is a faked story, but so natural that it was accepted as true. Many persons were ready to embrace this poor little boy, who, finding a baby abandoned on some steps, takes it home and begs his mother to adopt it. It was a touching scene, as the mother, a poor woman, hesitates to take another charge, but the boy wins his case by kissing tenderly his mother. The great sympathy of the audience is maintained to the last and there is no loss of illusion, as the boy, now as a man, proves himself a good honest character.

"The Mysterious Double," a film that can be commended as good work in every respect, was poorly received. From the very start it was easy to see that the production was a fake. This story is taken from the theme of Giroflee and Girofla, a very amusing French light opera of two twin sisters.

The manufacturers of this film discarded the idea of twin sisters, to show two girls, perfect strangers to each other, and bring out some complex situations, of the lover of Aileen making love to Irene and vice versa.

The unreal part of the film is that if the two girls had the same features, same eyes, same hair, they were of two very distinct positions in life, making them discernible. One is the petted child of rich and fond parents, brought up in luxury, while the other is a gypsy, of very different manners, dress, and surely of complexion, as we know that the gypsies are always darker from their existence in the open air. The spectators quickly grabbed the situation, and as it was a fake film they did not give it the proper credit.

The plot of "The Medicine Bottle" is natural enough and would have made a very good dramatic film if the producers had been more careful in the actions. By a mistake the producers give the sad and painful impression that the bottles have been mixed intentionally for a criminal purpose, instead of by a mere accident, as described in the sketch. The daughter shows her displeasure at the sickness of her mother, which detains her from joining her friends. When the old lady calls for a glass of water, the daughter hands her the glass in such a reluctant manner that when she accidentally mixes the bottles and gives instructions to the little girl how to give the medicine to the grandmother, the audience is badly shocked at this supposed murderess, who, not having the courage to commit the act herself, takes an innocent and sweet little girl as her accomplice.

Eventually the truth appears when we see the daughter calling on the 'phone and getting excited as she cannot connect. We understand that she is not a murderess, that the bottles have been mixed accidentally, but it is too late; the bad impression left its mark.

In the same film the producers badly exaggerate the telephone service. We know that the "hello" girls are young, full of life and fun, and, as young girls, have many amusing stories to narrate. On the other hand, we must also remember that these girls are under very strict discipline, consequently the prolonged negligence, as shown on the screen, is materially an impossibility; not only impossible, but an insult to the numerous girls who are working long hours at small pay. Instead of showing so many times the switchboard with the girls talking and not answering the calls, the producers could have found another excuse for the delay in the service, as an accident to the wire, etc.

In a certain historic film we see the brave soldiers of George Washington fighting the British soldiers with repeating guns.

"Hard to Beat" is another film which is really hard to beat for unnatural actions. No gamblers, even in a raid, are going to place all the money and cards in a satchel and leave same under the table, at the mercy of a colored waiter. And what are these officers? They make a raid, they arrest the gamblers, but do not arrest the waiter and they do not look for proof of the crime; they do not hunt for the money, chips, cards, etc. The sketch is a very poor one and the producers did not improve it.

Let us hope that the manufacturers will accept these remarks in the same friendly spirit in which they are given. Improve the work.

MOVING PICTURE OPERATORS' BRANCH.

Local 35 I. A. T. S. E.

All operators of the local are requested to attend the next regular meeting at the meeting rooms, Gallagher's Hall, 402 Eighth avenue, on Monday, April 5, 12.30 midnight. Matters of exceedingly great importance will be transacted. We will have the pleasure of a visit of some noted officers and factors of organized labor.

WANTED—SENSATIONAL FILMS!

A rather unusual request comes from an exhibitor in the South. Mr. Wm. McFarland, Box 462, Richmond, Va., writes that he sees in the World much talk about censorship and sensational film subjects and wants to be put in touch with some exchange that can furnish him with such, as he says his patrons "want these sort of pictures." He thinks that he should be able to buy some of them up very cheap now that the demand has lessened.

A NOVELTY FROM KALEM.

A complete travelogue on the order of those which have made Burton Holmes famous will be issued by Kalem Company on April 9. The title is "A Trip to the Wonderland of America," and it illustrates the Yellowstone Park as it never has been illustrated before. The pictures show the geysers in action, a triumph of photography, since it is difficult to obtain clear negatives because of the mist that always gathers about them.

The lecture accompanying this picture is by Col. Edward Justus Parker, national lecturer of the Salvation Army, and is not only instructive, but is entertaining as well.

The Chicago Film Exchange, by special arrangement with John Krone, of Chicago, has secured the exclusive booking rights for the United States and Canada of the "Summers-Britt Fight Pictures," which were taken before the National Sporting Club in London, England, on February 22, 1909. The pictures are said to be remarkably clear and show up the live action all through the bout. They have drawn crowded houses wherever shown.

The Unique Film and Construction Company, Unity Building, Chicago, Ill., is a concern rapidly coming to the front among the independent film renters in the West. The Unique is in a class of its own and makes a specialty of subjects that are not handled by other film exchanges. Mr. McMillan, the president, has spent much time and money to maintain this exclusive service and opened communications with several European manufacturers who are not represented in this country. He will sail for Europe in a short time to make personal selection of subjects that are suitable to the American market. From a little two-room office, a few months ago, with perhaps sixty reels of stock, the Unique has advanced rapidly and now occupies a handsome suite of rooms on the third floor of the Unity Building. Much of this success is due to the personality of Mr. McMillan, who is one of the most popular film men in Chicago.

MOTION PICTURE PATENTS COMPANY.

THEIR POLICY AND PROCEDURE.

The farsightedness of the captains of the motion picture industry was shown in unmistakable fashion when the Motion Picture Patents Company of New York commenced its radical movement of picture reform last week. Acting upon an unmistakable public demand for decent pictures, the Patents company determined to put an end to the offensive subjects, and to so regulate the theaters under its license that the motion picture show would be put on a par with the very highest form of theatrical endeavor.

Accordingly, the company organized and put into immediate operation three special departments. The first was a Board of Censorship, which met for the first time on March 25th and examined 18,000 feet of film, the total licensed output for the week. This board sat simultaneously with a board appointed by the People's Institute of New York, which included such representative public bodies as the Board of Education, Society for the Prevention of Crime, Ethical Culture League, Church Societies, Civic Society, People's Institute, etc. Sections were ordered to be cut out of several films. The two boards will work in harmony and will criticise and correct the 18 new reels received each week.

The civic board and the company's board are confident that censorship will not long be necessary, as the old rule of demand and supply is already in application and the manufacturers will produce no more objectionable pictures.

The Patents company is firmly determined that none of the hundred exchanges holding its licenses shall receive a single picture that doesn't come up to the highest standard of decency and that has not either an educational, moral or cleanly amusing value. Consequently none of the 5,000 licensed theaters will be able to secure an objectionable film, and it will be but a question of a short time when the confidence of the great public will be restored, and the motion picture will assume its rightful position on a level with the very highest grade of theatrical endeavor.

With the latter great object in view, the Patents company has organized a Bureau of Inspection. This bureau will investigate every licensed theater in the United States, and will revoke the licenses of any houses that do not comply strictly with the fire laws, that are not well ventilated, and that are not clean and as light as may be compatible with the proper projection of the pictures upon the screen.

The day of the dingy room moving picture show is passed and gone forever, according to the statement of the general manager of the Patents company. The movement on the part of the Patents company is for the good of the picture business everywhere, and should meet with the general support of the exhibitors, as it is sure to have the backing of the public which it seeks to safeguard and protect.

The second remedial department has as its sole object the compelling of all licensed theaters to comply strictly with the fire laws, and receives its instructions from the third department, known as the Bureau of Inspection, whose duty it is to see that the licensed theaters in every State in the Union are made light, clean, sanitary and well ventilated Any theater that fails to live up to the conditions thus laid down will immediately lose its license.

"We hope to change places with the drama as an educational force," said a prominent member of the Patents company. "The drama is at present suffering severely from the salacious tendency that has affected it this season. Shakespereian or classical plays, or high moral drama, are dead; there is no demand for them, and their place has been taken by the show with the undressing scenes and low humor. The picture show on the other hand, reaching as it does into every town of over 700 inhabitants, and appealing to the millions of school children and poor of the land to whom the five-cent rate of admission especially appeals, has educational value almost beyond calculation. From now on the pictures will be either educational or cleanly amusing, and will be absolutely moral. As a Sunday attraction it is the deadliest foe to the corner saloon. To the temptations to which young people are subjected on that day, when there is nothing going on of decent quality to engage their attention, and to the dangers of street playing to young children I reckon it to be the greatest educational force in the world after the public school."

WEEKLY COMMENTS ON THE SHOWS.

By Our Own Critic.

In several respects I was disappointed with this visit, which was to the Princess, at Fifty-ninth street and Columbus Circle, right in the heart of a very fine theater district and on the fringe of the land where the patrician abodes, or rather the wealthy person, for, of course, strictly speaking there are no patricians in this city of multi-millionaires. I looked for a theater as handsome as the Keith & Proctor houses of Fourteenth and Twenty-third streets. I reasoned that the Columbus Circle neighborhood would support such a place. I was disappointed, as I have said. I am angry at having been charged ten cents for an entertainment not half so good as the one for which I paid five cents on Third avenue and Fourteenth street a few weeks ago. I hope the proprietor will not take this adverse criticism amiss. I think that if he beautified his hall, made it less barn-like and gave up-to-date films he would attract more patronage. My visit was in the early afternoon. For some time I was the only occupant of the hall; when I left, after about an hour's stay, there were ten other persons in the place, which probably hold 400 people. The show was advertised to commence at one o'clock. It commenced at half-past. The first subject was a historical one, dealing, I think, with French cavaliers, love, duelling, war and the usual etc., of a remote century. There was no title on the subject, so I don't know its name. The film either broke or stopped midway during its progress, and the operator's hand was constantly obscuring parts of the picture. Not a very auspicious start, brothers, was it? However, better luck attended the song slides dealing with a man, a maid, a moon and a boat. The song was well sung by a man, and the slides are really well colored. May I offer all slide makers a piece of advice, and that is, Not to color their excellent slides so heavily. I believe they would be more generally appreciated. After this the fun began to thicken. An old subject, "Mysterious Flames," a prettily colored film, introduced many startling tricks and some most delightful dances by pretty dancers. This sort of thing is evidently to popular taste. Give us more of it, Messrs. Exhibitors. The heartiest laugh of the afternoon was at the film, "The Troublesome Theft," of Pathe. Here a man robs another of a parcel, which, when he drops it, leads him and those about to suppose that it is a bomb. This results in general fright and many ludicrous incidents. The scene where the French gendarmes in the police office go mad with horror at the probability of the wretched thing going off is one of the finest pieces of motion picture acting I have ever seen. Finally, of course, the lawful owner recovers the parcel, which simply contains material for a picnic, and as the man, his wife and children sit down in the open wood for a meal the thief is a disappointed spectator of their enjoyment. Another picture was the "Devil's Three Sins," in which his satanic majesty exults over a man taking a drink, infidelity and murder. Fortunately it is all a dream. A slight theme cleverly work out.

Unless I am very much mistaken, all these pictures are Independent or old subjects, and, on the whole, I think to a miscellaneous audience they would be found very amusing. Certainly they compare very favorably with competing productions.

I would like to put in a word for the excellence of the effects produced by the young man at this theater. He is quite an expert at the game. When I visit the Princess again I hope to see it rebuilt, gorgeously decorated and appointed and making a pile of money for its proprietor. There should be room up town for many handsome moving picture theaters, such as we are told are to exist all over America in "the new order of things."

NEW PATHE MACHINE.

Pathe Freres, 41 West Twenty-fifth street, New York, have just issued a handsome catalogue describing their new projecting machine, which they will be pleased to mail to any exhibitor desirous of procuring a high-class outfit.

The Henry B. Ingram Company, Inc., of this city, has purchased all the sets of slides owned by the Presto Song Slide Exchange, which has gone out of business.

A society has been founded in Rome to open a great cinematograph of art. In Paris some of the greatest dramatic authors are adapting cinema from novels and celebrated plays, and also from celebrated historical events. In Italy also many of the celebrated dramatic writers are adapting scenes from Italian plays and novels.

Comments on Film Subjects.

The most ambitious film released during the week was the Vitagraph's rendition of King Lear, but there has been an unusual number of interesting and amusing pictures. The amusing films have rather predominated, and some of the comedies have been above the average. A number of topical and educational films have also been shown which have added to the interest of the programmes.

In dramatic construction some of the films are weak. Manufacturers should listen to some of the comments made by theater-goers who are alert to catch on to every lapse of realism. This was especially noticed wherever Edison's "A Cry from the Wilderness" was shown, in which some scenes are grand, but the spell is broken when in one scene a brick house is shown among the snow huts of the frozen North, and another scene shows a mounted policeman in regular uniform, while the natives are wrapped in heavy furs. The essence of art is to conceal that it is art. Look to the details, Mr. Producer.

Another Film d'Art.

On Monday of this week we were shown a specimen print of a religious subject that has been prepared by Pathe for Easter week; although it is a film that will no doubt have a long run and be resorted to again on other suitable dates. "The Kiss of Judas" is an incident from the life of Christ that lends itself to dramatic representation, and with the aid of M. Albert Lambert, who essays the role of Jesus, and M. Mounet-Sully, the Judas (both prominent members of the Academie Francaise, Paris), Pathe Freres have given us a film of high dramatic merit. Perhaps too much so, for general approval, and this is the principal criticism we have to offer, that as the scenes flit over the screen it is the actor and his art that rivets the attention. Seeing the film again under different conditions, this feeling might not be so strong, and while the greatest credit is due the company for the serious work they have performed, yet we are convinced that the leading character acted a part for which his temperament was unsuitable. Without saying more, this should make our meaning clear, and no adverse criticism would detract from its merits as a work of art—but only art. Photographically the film is up to the best from the Pathe studios, and we have never seen a film that appeared more steady on the screen. This may be due to the fact that it was run on one of the new Pathe projecting machines, of which we will have more to say in another number.

"William Tell," a dramatic film issued by the Great Northern Film Company this week, is a good example of the excellent progress this concern is making in cinematographic art. We happened around while the Board of Censors were sitting in judgment on the film and the opinion expressed by one member of the Board was that it was the "best film that he had yet seen." The actors are well adapted to their parts and the scenes are well laid and the photography up to their usual high quality. This concern has introduced a most pleasing effect of double toning, which, especially in their film "From the North Cape," shows up with striking effect. The rocky coast is shown in a natural brownish hue, while the sea and sky show well in a blue-green.

"Arabian Horsemen."—An Eclipse film in which the photography is especially good, and the views showing the Arabs riding are far beyond the average of such films. In only one particular is there any criticism. In some instances the horses came too close to the camera, causing bad blurring.

"A Benevolent Employer."—An Eclipse film in which an employer is assisting his ill employees, supplying them with medicines and ministering to their wants. Later the same empoyees are represented demanding increased wages or else they will strike. Whether intended or not, this film is wonderfully true to life.

"Whale Fishing in Southern Waters."—A Pathe picture illustrating the capture of a whale as it is done now, and the dismemberment and rendering afterward. The picture is technically up to the Pathe standard, and is excellent from an educational standpoint.

"His Last Illusion Gone."—A Pathe subject which does not seem quite clear. The story is that an elderly man's fiancee leaves him for a younger man, and when the old gentleman discovers it, which he does by means of a letter written by another, he shoots himself. The photography is excellent, and the staging is better than some of the Pathe films.

Yellowstone Park geysers in action, roaring cataracts, and panoramic views of Nature's grandest spectacle is the subject of the film issued this week by the Kalem Company. A descriptive lecture, which may be obtained from the company or any licensed exchange, should be read and will help to make this film a novel and desirable change from the usual programme.

"For Love's Sake."—An interesting and, in places, thrilling playlet by the Essanay's capable company. A young man plainly shows his preference for the village postmaster's daughter, refusing to pay attention to another. The rejected one, in a fit of jealousy, writes a letter to the young man which the postmaster's daughter intercepts. The jealous girl, to get revenge, seizes a quantity of letters which the postmaster's daughter has been assorting, rips them open and puts them in the pocket of her coat. She next goes to the constable and secures a warrant for the postmaster's daughter. Before the officers arrive the young man has found the letters, transferred them to his own pocket, says he took them, and is sent to prison. The daughter admits that she took the first letter. Her father drives her out of doors. The scene changes and she has become a great singer. Released upon confession of the girl who really took the letters, the young man gets work at the theater where his former financee is singing. They meet, renew their old love and return home to receive the blessing of the old man, who has never ceased to mourn for his daughter. The play is interesting, the acting is strong and the technical quality of the film is good. The Essanay people are to be congratulated upon this production.

"Life On a French Training Ship."—A series of views from Pathe showing life on a training ship where youths are prepared for the navy. The pictures are good and give a good idea of how these boys are trained.

"The Warden's Nightmare."—A Pathe comic which shows the effects of dreaming over the picture of a prisoner. All sorts of strange things happen, such as only the Pathes know how to do.

"Across the Border."—A Gaumont which represents some of the difficulties which may arise in crossing the border of two countries where the customs regulations are strictly enforced. A simple country couple start for the city. They are stopped on the way by a band of strolling gypsies and a woman falls in love with the young man, trying to induce him to stay with her, but he refuses. To get revenge she hides some articles in the girl's pack which cause her arrest. She next stabs the young man and goes to his house and marks the door post with a bloody hand. Afterward the woman, afflicted with remorse, confesses and the young girl is released. But whether the lovers are reunited or not the film does not say.

"The Hunchback Brings Luck."—A Pathe comedy which represents an individual as obliged to flee from his creditors. He invests in a lottery ticket offered by a hunchback and wins. He advertises for the hunchback that was selling lottery tickets, promising a reward, and is beset with a mob. The long chase which follows is funny. He finds the one of whom he purchased his ticket and rewards him, and the rest are driven away.

"A Peaceful Inn."—A Pathe comic that develops some new features of hotel life, ending in a fire. The appearance of rats is very cleverly managed, and the dancing furniture is surprising.

"The Stolen Plans, or the Boy Detective."—A Vitagraph subject which partakes of the melodramatic. Two men call upon an old inventor to look over some plans. They drug him and steal them. His son vows to secure them again, and after a number of hairbreadth escapes he does so. The action is very spirited, the staging is good, and the audience watches with the closest attention the final discomfiture and arrest of the conspirators. The picture will be certain to please.

"Willie's Fall from Grace."—The Vitagraph has produced a comedy in this film which is true to life. It shows Willie being dressed up carefully by his mother and sent to church. Boys playing marbles and a baseball game tempt him, but he passes them by. The next, boys fishing, is too much and he succumbs. While fishing he falls asleep and dreams that the church bells are chasing him. To escape he jumps into the water. He falls in just as a policeman appears and drives the boys away. Willie's reception at home was warm. The film is funny and may be safely included in any programme.

"Hard to Beat."—An Edison comedy which just misses being funny. While there is some fun in it, numerous details are missing and the film seems like a string of disconnected incidents rather than a complete story.

"Oh, Rats."—An Edison comic in which rats are used to scare a cook away, who refused to go otherwise. It has some amusing situations, and when the man of the house undertakes to order her out and is driven from the kitchen the laughter is loud.

"The Photograph Habit."—A comedy from the Lubin studio which illustrates the difficulties of an amateur photographer. It might be said in favor of this much maligned crank that this picture is exaggerated, but it is funny, and some of the situations are not impossible. The photography is good and the action is all that could be desired.

"Help, Police."—A Lubin comedy in which two young women dress as policemen and go to a masquerade ball. The numerous funny situations keep the audience laughing from the beginning to the end. The scenes at the ball are good, and the chase develops a good many spills, which always make the audience laugh.

"The Medicine Bottle."—In this Biograph picture two common subjects are treated very graphically. One is the necessity of having poisonous liquids in a bottle different from others, and the other is the utility of the telephone in times of great hurry. A mother goes away and leaves a little girl to care for a sick grandmother. The mother takes by mistake the bottle of medicine prepared for the patient, leaving a bottle of poisonous liniment in its place, after carefully instructing her little daughter about giving the medicine to her grandmother. The acting when the little one begins to prepare for the administering of the medicine is especially good. Fortunately the little girl meets with three accidents, otherwise the dose would have been given. Frantically the mother tries to get her home on the telephone, but central is busy discussing the latest hats. Finally, however, it is done and the audience heaves a sigh of relief. The action in some parts is too long drawn out. The subject is one of those homely every-day occurrences which is certain to attract favorable comment.

"Jones and His New Neighbors."—The Biograph's character, Jones, has been getting into more trouble, but like all his other scrapes he gets successfully out of this one too. Jones moves into a house which is exactly like every other house in the row. He comes home at night and gets into the wrong house and the complications which follow are funny even if overdone.

"The Stolen Sausage."—A Pathe comedy which develops some interesting variations of the always amusing chase. To see a sausage used as a cable is indeed a novelty, and in this case it is a lively one at that.

"The Pretty Dairymaid."—A Pathe film which has many elements of attractiveness. A madman, who the dairymaid rejects, shoots her with a gun belonging to another. The owner of the gun is charged with murder and is locked up. But the madman is heard at the grave of the murdered girl, and this brings about the release of the man charged with murder, while the madman himself is driven to his death from a precipice. While the subject does not appeal especially, it is a beautiful film. The toning is exceptionally good and the rolling surf is splendid as it dashes in foam over the rocks. The setting and the acting are both up to the standard of the Pathe house.

"Child of the Regiment."—A Pathe picture which is based upon something so horrible that it makes one shudder involuntarily. A family are trying to escape from a plague stricken district. First the mother dies by the roadside, then the father drops, leaving a little child who can barely toddle. The little one wanders along the road until finally it stumbles into a regiment of soldiers. It is immediately adopted as the child of the regiment. The scenery along the roadside is especially beautiful, and the toning and technical qualities of the film are beyond criticism.

"What Three Tots Saw in the Land of Nod."—In this film from the Pathe studio three little tots take a long journey in the Land of Nod, and the strange things they saw afford opportunity for some of the Pathe's exceptionally attractive wonder work. The beautiful sights will please every child, and older ones will not object to seeing it. The film is technically up to the best of the Pathe output.

"Children of the Plains."—In this Vitagraph picture life on the plains in early days is fairly well represented. A family journeying by team through the West is set upon by a band of Indians and all are killed with the exception of two little girls. One is taken by the Indians and the other is rescued by the soldiers. Before the attack the mother has given them each a locket as a means of identification. The little ones are separated. One grows up among the Indians and the other among the soldiers. The one who lives with the soldiers rejects a suitor, who has her carried away by the Indians, and there she meets her sister. They recognize each other by the lockets and both escape together to the post. The action is spirited. There are some details overlooked, but they do not affect the main incidents of the story nor detract from its interest. The audience applauds when the two girls escape.

"The Infant Terrible."—A Selig comedy which is based upon the penchant of the average boy to get others into scrapes, and the things this fellow thinks of and perpetrates upon unsuspecting visitors and others are enough to drive one mad. He gets all that is coming to him and appears in the last scene with a large pillow fastened to him and eating his meals standing up. It is funny and excites a great deal of amused comment in the audience. One gentleman near the writer said that it was the best bit of comedy he ever saw in a motion picture.

"A Burglar's Mistake."—The Biograph have achieved another success in this representation of a story that seems to come from real life. A man who is consorting with crooks demands blackmail of an old acquaintance because he remembers a little indiscretion of early youth. He obtains the money and straightway gambles it away. He next undertakes to assist in burglarizing a house which proves to be the residence of the man upon whom he levied the blackmail. He is caught and held up at the muzzle of a revolver. When the master of the house discovers who the burglar is, notwithstanding his plea for life, he shoot him, as he has an undoubted right to do. The acting is quite up to the Biograph's capable standard and the scenes all seem to have some point to them. The question as to whether the master of the house should have shot the burglar is one that must be decided by others. Perhaps it is sufficient here to remark that he certainly had strong provocation.

"Swedish Dances."—This film from Pathe illustrates a number of the Swedish national dances. The action and costuming are excellently reproduced. One watching the different dances does not have to study long to discover where the present popular barn dance originated.

"The Idler."—A Pathe comedy in which an idle fellow is forever falling asleep and dreaming that his work is accomplished. But his practical wife enforces discipline very severely, though apparently it does no good. The film ends in a scene in which the lazy husband is getting furiously belabored for some shortcoming. This bit fills in with more solid films very acceptably.

"Mad Dog."—A Lubin which is a good travesty upon the average mad-dog scare. A little boy becomes frightened at a small dog barking and yells, "Mad dog." The result is a long line of people running away from a little white poodle, which couldn't hurt one of them if given an opportunity. Finally a squad of police are turned out and succeed in capturing the little dog, which is about as large as a cat. Then everybody is surprised to think that he ran from such an insignificant beast. The film is funny and teaches "what fools these mortals be" at the same time.

"A Just Reward."—A story of love in a carpet factory from the Lubin studio. Without entering into details it is, perhaps, sufficient to say that the superintendent of a carpet factory undertakes to discharge one of the employees, when all the other girls declare they will go too. The proprietor's son appears at this juncture and sends them all back to work and reprimands the superintendent. The superintendent, to get even, sends the girl to the top of the factory after thread, sneaks up behind her, shuts and locks the door. She saws out the lock, creeps down stairs and hides behind the stock as the superintendent goes after her with a lantern. Coming back he throws a match into some chemicals, there is an explosion, which sets the mill on fire and seriously injures him. He starts up stairs, falls insensible and leaves the girl to battle with the flames, which she does very successfully until the firemen, led by the son, appear and take her away nearly fainting with exhaustion. She marries the son as her reward for saving his fortune. It is a pretty enough story, not improbable, and the scenes are realistic.

"The Wooden Indian."—A Vitagraph which introduces a new scheme of fun. Two tramps are given a quantity of clothing, among which is an Indian costume. One proposes to sell the other to a cigar dealer for a sign. The project is successfully carried out and the sign is duly erected before the cigar dealer's door. When he undertakes to drive nails in the foot of the statue to keep it from tipping over the sign jumps down and runs. It is funny and quite original in conception.

"The Politician."—A Gaumont which is supposed to show the difficulties under which a French politician labors. He makes his ante-election promises, and his house is stripped of its furniture when his constituents call afterward to remind him that he has not kept them.

SOME INTERNATIONAL PROJECTING AND PRODUCING COMPANY'S FILMS.

A heart story with the Eclair trade-mark was quite up to the standard of the best in staging, but the acting was rather weak in some instances. It is the story of a family in which the husband and father indulged too much in liquor. He left the house in a rage one day, after hurling both his wife and daughter to the floor. The little girl goes for fagots for the fire and comes staggering in with a huge load. Then she lights the fire, which flashes and blinds her. A friendly tramp takes her to a hospital where she is placed in a cot for treatment.

The next scene shows the father about his daily task, which was trimming trees. He falls from the high limb, is seriously hurt and is taken to the hospital. He is placed in the cot adjoining the one his daughter occupies. She recognizes his voice and asks to be taken to him. The last scene shows the family united through their misfortune. The title is "United by Misfortune."

"La Potiche."—This is from the Lux studio and is a story of deceit which is played upon a collector of pottery. He procures a vase which pleases him immensely. While out searching for the mate to it an adventuress steals it. The collector afterward visits her in her home. She shows him the vase and sells it to him for a large sum because it matches the one he already has. Meanwhile a different one has been substituted and when he places the new one on the mantel beside it he is shocked to see that they do not match. He undertakes to fathom the mystery, but while thinking it out the attendant substitutes the one he has brought in for the one on the shelf and then shows him that he was deceived and did not buy a mate to the first vase after all. The acting is good and the photography is excellent. As a bit of lively comedy this film is a success.

"De Comtess de Valeria."—Here is a beautifully photographed film of love, jealousy and intrigue, with the imprisonment of the countess in a convent, her escape through the machinations of her lover and the guards and the use of a rope ladder and their marriage by a father of the church just in time to save her from the objections of an angry father. The tones of this film are particularly rich and pleasing where daylight is represented. The blue toning for night is not so good, but is better than many. The trade-mark is that of Hepteroux.

"A Moonlight Trip on the Nile," which is used through the courtesy of the Messrs. Cook, is a beautiful piece of work. All the romance and poetry of this famous old river are crowded into this film. The frequent change of scene adds to the interest and it is withal a beautiful piece of work.

"A Stormy Sea."—This film carries the Italia trade-mark and is beyond question a marvelously beautiful illustration of the sea in its angry mood. Different views are shown, in all of which one involuntarily starts back to escape the drenching spray which is hurled from the rocks in blinding masses of foam. The toning in some of the scenes is exquisite and faithfully reproduces the appearance of the water and foam.

"A Plucky Little Girl," "King for an Hour," a Raleigh and Robert film, and "Foolshead Looks for a Duel," with the Italia mark, were all excellent films, both technically and in the acting.

THE SONGS.

The illustrated songs of the week have shown a decided improvement. The songs themselves have been better and the opportunity has been accepted by the slide makers. "Just Someone," illustrated by A. L. Simpson, was unusually attractive. The pictures were very good and illustrated the sentiment of the song perfectly.

Others were nearly as good. Apparently whatever cause for criticsm has been noted in the past is disappearing. The songs now add greatly to the programmes in all theaters where they are used. The pleasing sentiment of all the later ones and the happy way in which they have been illustrated has served to make them far more popular than they ever were before. "My Bonnie Blue Bell" was sung at the Keith & Proctor house and the audience evidently enjoyed both the song and the singer. The slides for this song, by Scott & Van Altena, were faultless.

THE LECTURES.

Among the lecturettes of the week two stand out with prominence. At the Keith & Proctor Theater on Fourteenth street there has been a lecture on the "Yellowstone Park" which has been far above the average. It purports to be the description of a trip actually taken by a young man who shows his own pictures and tells his own story. The pictures are so different and are so good that they hold the attention firmly. There is no question about the interest of those who heard it.

At the Unique Theater, Buffalo Jones, the man who has evolved a new meat animal by crossing the buffalo and the ordinary cow, has been telling his story, illustrating it with slides and motion pictures. The motion pictures are not good technically, but the subject matter is so interesting that the audience sits up as soon as these pictures begin to run. They are scenes of cowboy life, the real life, not the posed kinds, and there are pictures of hunting mountain lions, or panthers, as they are known in the East, showing the lion climbing a tree and the man after him, and pictures of bears moving about in the open. It is all interesting and has been a pleasing change from the usual motion picture.

MOVING PICTURES IN SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. Adolph Mayer, of the firm of Turner & Dahnken, 138 Eddy street, San Francisco, recently paid us a visit to report on the condition of affairs in his city. Turner & Dahnken are the principal firm of renters there. Generally we gathered from Mr. Mayer that licensed film is in the greatest demand and that the moving picture business is in a prosperous state in San Francisco. Prices of admission to theaters there are much higher than in the East, but the houses are handsomer and are patronized by the best class of people. Turner & Dahnken are licensees of the Motion Picture Patents Company, whose policy seems to be successful in the extreme West. We are glad to have had the opportunity of meeting so intelligent and progressive a member of the trade as Mr. Mayer, who informs us that San Francisco moving picture operators are prosperous and work in harmony with all exhibitors and give them entire satisfaction, which pleases the audiences in general. Mr. Mayer has visited several factories in New York City with the idea of making himself acquainted with the manufacture of moving pictures. He also informs us that if the associated manufacturers could supply a larger quantity of film, Messrs. Turner & Dahnken could take the entire supply. He met Mr. MacDonald, the general manager of the Motion Picture Patents Company, who received him well and showed him over the company's handsome offices and exhibiting room. Mr. Mayer's impression is that the Motion Picture Patents Company's policy will be successful. He is satisfied that it is to the future interest of all exhibitors and that qualitatively the films of the associated manufacturers are all that could be desired.

20TH CENTURY ARE WELL SATISFIED.

During a conversation with the 20th Century Optiscope Company, of Chicago, in asking the manager how conditions have been since they have gone Independent, I was greatly surprised to learn that they had increased their business 15 per cent. since the public have become acquainted with the fact that they had gone Independent.

"A Trust film exchange of Kansas City began to get so shaky when they found us taking on so many of their customers with our Independent films, that they immediately got up a circular letter, trying to square matters and make their customers believe they had been assured that territory to themselves by he Trust. They also intimated in their letter that all other Trust film exchanges in opposition to them would also be out in a very short time, and that their straight, clean and above board methods of complying with the Trust rules and regulations was the means of their being a favorite of the Trust.

"We wish to state that this is not true, as we know the Trust too well to make any undesirable film exchange a favorite of any particular locality, as they are only waiting for a chance to put in another Trust exchange of their own, wherever they can freeze out any individual Trust film exchange, and for the information of the general public, we went to the expense of reproducing the telegram we sent to the Patents company and had same published so that the public might easily observe that we were not shut off, and that we went out from our own free will, and that we have been happy ever afterwards."

"It seems as though Kansas City is a hotbed of liberty, where they won't stand for Trust methods of any description, and in addition to not losing any business, our business has increased at least 25 per cent. at that point. To make it even the more interesting for our unfair competition we have contracted with the leading moving picture theater, operated by Dr. Ray, called the Olympic, for March 31, to exhibit ten reels of Independent film, and have sent out invitations to every theater manager to be present, so as to prove that they are not taking any chances in going Independent, and prove that our films are at least equal, if not superior, to Trust films."

"LIFE OF A MOVING PICTURE COMEDIAN."

This is a great life. I have been in the moving picture biz working for The Essanay for two years, and I must say I had many a good fall, and many a good bump, and I think I have broken about twenty barrels of dishes, upset stoves, and also broken up many sets of beautiful furniture, had my eyes blackened, both ankles sprained and many bruises, and I am still on the go. This is a great business. I shall never forget how about a year ago I engaged a fellow to play a part in one of our pictures; he was to be thrown into the water, and I asked him if he could swim, and he said yes, so he was engaged to play that part. I, being a comedian, was to throw him into the water, which I did. The moment he hit the water he went down, and as soon as he came up he began to holler "Get the boat!" "Get the boat!" "Get the boat!" He came very near drowning. The moving picture operator was still grinding when the producer hollered to him to stop. We finally got the boat and got him out. The moment he got on shore he started to run, and we haven't seen him since. The hardest picture that I ever worked in, when I got mine, is called "Midnight Disturbance," where a dog, and a bulldog at that, has to catch a pad which is attached to my waist, so he missed the pad, and he caught a piece of my flesh. I upset some of the scenery and we had to take it over again. On rehearsing the dog so as to catch the pad, I was bit several times, but the producer only says to me—"Well, Ben, does it hurt?"

CORRESPONDENCE.

AN EXHIBITOR CRITICISES SOME FILMS.

Edmonton, Alberta, Canada, March 27, 1909.

Editor The Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—I strongly disagree with those of your correspondents who seem to think "censorship" unnecessary. Let me refer them to the Pathe film "Life's Realities"—the part showing the baker kneading dough, spitting in it, wiping perspiration from his forehead, and then the young man vomiting to his heart's content (?). Nice decent picture to throw on the screen. Humph! Well whoever gets that particular reel after it left me will never see that part of the story—it went up in smoke in Edmonton.

"Money Mad," by the Biograph company, an assault on a little girl, three murders and a drunken suicide, all in one film—no censorship needed. Bah!

"Making Moving Pictures," by Vitagraph, if shown by us would have lost us $50 in business at least. I refused to accept it.

"Dumb Witness," by Vitagraph, compare the curtains, style of window, position of bureau, bed, etc., with the same as shown in court room scene. Some of my patrons gave me the laugh as they passed out.

Pathe has a film story presumed to show a hat covering a hole in a box containing a man, and yet the audience can look through the box and see it is empty, indeed. Fake!

This city may be the northern end of railroading in North America, and outside of presumed civilization, but we would consider ourselves fools to run the stuff turned out by manufacturers in toto, without our censoring—running it through our machine before showing and making a selection. There is too much innuendo of immorality in too many films—too much marital unfaithfulness, too many wanton murders.

F. H. Richardson deserves credit for his criticism (issue March 6) of "Duke of Guise Assassination."

Respectfully,

A. R. LAWRENCE.

THE INTERNATIONAL PROJECTING AND PRODUCING COMPANY.

By a London Correspondent.

Your issue of February 20, just to hand, illuminates the momentary period of kinematographic darkness occasioned on this side by the absence from London of Mr. Will. G. Barker. We are relieved to find that he is still in the forefront of a battle with, as an able coadjutor, Mr. Raleigh, of Messrs. Raleigh & Roberts, a subsidiary branch of Mr. Barker's London firm. Mr. W. G. Barker is a great man, with great ideas, fluent and possessing an enthusiasm which is—for the time being—infectious. Once upon a time he informed the present writer that he pulled the strings of a conference at which thirty-three European representatives were present, and made the said delegates see things as they appeared to his own eyes—the true kinematographic spirit. Unfortunately the conference was futile. Resolutions were passed; much time and eloquence were wasted; many thousands of dollars were voted and promised for propaganda work, but with no result. A pleasant holiday, perhaps, for some of us; but our object was business, not pleasure. Presumably Mr. Barker's new idea of establishing and controlling the International Projecting and Producing Company, with the aid of 27 European firms—20 of which, you say, may be rated as of the first class—is just what is wanted, if the said "first class firms" existed. Will you permit me to analyze? It is an established fact that the chief European film publishers, who produce over 90 per cent. of the Eastern, or European, output, are the firms of Pathe, Urban, Eclipse, Gaumont and Radios. Where, then, do the "20 first class firms" come in? Many most excellent houses are mentioned in the advertising columns of a contemporary journal of the same issue as your own, but they are to the trade what the Monthly Magazine is to the Daily Press. The Press guides and controls public opinion, securing at great cost and furnishing for general edification, the latest news of the day. The Monthly Journal simply appeals to a limited section by subjects calculated to relieve business tension and incidental worries, supplying material intended solely to attain these excellent objects. The Press is the master; the Magazine is the mistress of the journalistic household. Therefore, by analogy, the firms controlling 90 per cent. of the European output control, also, the situation. The remaining 10 per cent. (or Magazine section) counts, certainly but only as an inferior factor, even in the proportion of 27 to 5—the last number representing the majority in output. Not one of these five great producing firms are represented by Mr. Will. G. Barker, notwithstanding the tall talk used by him during his American excursion.

M. M.

[Our correspondent, who writes under a nom-de-plume, indulges in further personalities which we eliminate. Anonymous correspondence should be impersonal. We print the article for the purpose of stating that we have seen and admired the European films; that they are being delivered in this country in large quantities; and that they are being publicly exhibited all over the United States. Evidently, then, Mr. Barker has opened this battle very successfully and we see no reason why he and those associated with him should not continue as they have begun.—Ed. M. P. W.].

MACHINE TROUBLES AND THEIR REMEDIES.

Chicago, Ill., February 24, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—In your issue of February 20 a Mr. Merritt L. Oxenham deals with machine troubles and their remedies, but he seems to have gotten things somewhat tangled. His instructions, too, so far as the writer can see, apply only to the Edison machine.

For instance, his answer to "Picture Dark on Left Side" could not apply to any other machine than the Edison, since with other machines the film gate either latches tight or don't latch at all.

In two places he refers to the "Fan." This is a new one on the writer! What is a motion picture "fan" anyhow?

He has a subject heading "White Spots Jump." Possibly Mr. Oxenham refers to what is known as "Travel Ghosts." To remedy this fault he says, "Adjust the fan and set it tight!" Now, Mr. Editor, what is a motion picture machine "fan"?

Unquestionably the man must mean "travel ghosts" when he says "white spots jump" and mean "shutter" when he says "fan"; but it would seem that one would at the very least learn the correct names of machine parts before blossoming forth as an instructor!

Mr. Oxenham calls a tube lens a "three piece lens," which is another new one on yours truly.

He instructs that to remedy poor take-up action one must increase the tension on the split pulley or lengthen the toggle joint. How many machines have either of these (split pulley or toggle joint) in connection with the take-up? So far as the writer knows, the Edison only.

Mr. Oxenham may be a perfectly competent operator. I do not know as to this. Many men of wide knowledge fail utterly when they attempt to place that knowledge before others through the medium of printer's ink. It really would seem, however, as I have said, that one would at least learn the correct names of machine parts before posing as instructors to the rest of us poor ignoramuses.

F. H. RICHARDSON.

No child of school age is to be allowed to attend any such show during school hours, unless accompanied by parent or guardian. Such exhibitions are forbidden on Sundays.

The roof of the Imperial Theater caved in a week ago and the building is damaged to such an extent that Fremont will be without vaudeville until some enterprising man erects a vaudeville theater. There is a good opening for same. At the Opera House, Carl Miller, manager, has put on vaudeville with the pictures and is drawing full houses. The Jewel Theater is one of the finest show houses in this section and shows only first-class licensed films. They are doing well.

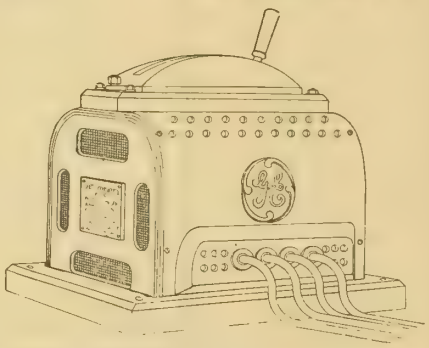
TRANSORMER

For Moving Picture Machines
(Alternating Current)

SIMPLE COMPACT EFFICIENT

THIS TRANSFORMER, KNOWN AS "THE G. E. ECONOMY-ARC" mustof necessity be an invaluable adjunct to any alternating current moving picture installation. THE ADVANTAGES OF A TRANSFORMER FOR THIS WORK WILL BE APPRECIATED by both the theatre management and operator; BY THE MANAGEMENT in the reduction of light bills and in the better production of the pictures due to the steady light obtained, AND BY THE OPERATOR in the simplicity of the device, the absence of danger from shocks,, and the added comfort in the lamp house due to the low heating.



Price, $75.00

THE SAVING IN POWER INSURED BY THE USE OF A TRANSFORMER INSTEAD OF A RHEOSTAT VARIES FROM 65 to 90 per cent., depending upon the voltage from the supply mains. Many lighting companies require the use of 220 volts for moving picture work in order to avoid heavily loading one side of a three wire system. This increases the loss considerably in circuits using a resistance or reactive device for reducing the voltage.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

A RUDE HOSTESS.—The above sobriquet most aptly fits the principal lady of this Biograph comedy drama, and although rudeness is almost an unpardonable offense, still we must not malign the lady, for she has just cause to be rude; and we must admit she was rude in the extreme, for anyone who would most entertainingly detain you only to hand you over to the police is perpetrating the very acme of rudeness. It happened thus: Mrs. Leffingwell has been favored with a visit by some friends in the early evening, and they departing, one of the ladies forgot her muff. Mrs. Leffingwell runs after her with the pulse warmer, overtaking her at the street door. Their second meeting conjures up renewed thoughts of gossip and they spend quite a time, for these are woman's happiest moments, in this regalement. In the interim a gentleman burglar enters the apartment and, finding the coast clear, starts in to work at once. He, by skillful manipulation, manages to open a small safe in which Mrs. Leffingwell keeps her money and jewels. He has scarcely procured the booty when the approach of some one startles him. Finding there is no means of escape, he puts the loot in his pocket and determines to brave the situation by subterfuge. To this end he reclines in an easy chair and feigns sleep. Mrs. Leffingwell is startled on her entrance at seeing this stranger, who appears to be the same when he sees her, pretending to have gotten into the wrong apartment. She is about to let him depart, when she discovers the safe open, and so, by enticing glances and invitations, induces him to remain. She then engages his attention while she slyly pulls the bellcord which brings her butler, whom she dispatches for the police, and when our gentleman friend is confident he has made a tremendous hit with his hostess two stalwart policemen enter and take him into custody, restoring, after a search, her money and valuables. The subject is most cleverly acted and sumptuously staged.

SCHNEIDER'S ANTI-NOISE CRUSADE.—Friend Schneider has been selected to respond to the toast "To the Ladies" at the annual banquet of the Liederkranz, the members feeling that they would hear something great, as Schneider was considered somewhat of a poet by his friends. Schneider goes home to prepare his poetic effusion and is interrupted by the arrival of his sister Lena and her young son Fritz. Now the trouble begins. First Fritz teases the parrot until its squawking annoys Schneider and he cannot write; next it is the phonograph, then a trombone, etc. However, night comes and all is still, when, hark, our friend is startled by mysterious footfalls. Investigating he finds burglars have entered the house, but they are musically inclined and have gathered together the above mentioned instruments of torture—phonograph, trombone, parrot, etc. Hence, Schneider not only helps them on their way, but pays them for what he esteems a blessing.

THE ROAD TO THE HEART.—It has ever been an undisputed theory that the road to the heart was through the stomach, but it remained for the later-day scientists to discover the reason. This was without doubt cleared in the discovery of the pneumogastric nerve, that highly sensitive fibrous cord that leads from the brain to the stomach. It is sometimes termed the Par Vagum, or wandering, as it in its course touches the pneumo and cardiac organs—the lungs and heart. In this Biograph subject we have a verification of the theory in a most pronounced form. Miguel, an old wealthy ranchero, disapproves of his daughter's marriage to Jose, a poor Mexican, and drives them from his house. Vinuella, Miguel's wife, resents his action by leaving with them. This sends Miguel into a fury, but still obdurate, he allows them to go, saying that he can get along without them. Now comes the crucial condition. He must have a housekeeper and so sends his servant to engage one. The first is a Chinaman, and to eat the food served by him is impossible. Next an Irish girl. She burns his chops. Finally a cowpuncher. He cooks a steak you couldn't cut with a chisel, and Miguel refuses to eat it. This incenses the cowboy, who becomes a veritable tornado of uproarious, volcanic, ferocious exacerbation, that the poor ranchero is anxious for his life. This cyclonic, fire-eating Bombastes Furioso pulls a couple of guns and puts bullet holes in everything, besides otherwise wrecking the place, and leaves the trembling ranchero more dead than alive from fright. Miguel makes his way disconsolately and sheepishly to his daughter's and son-in-law's cabin, where he finds them seated enjoying a peaceful repast. The savory aroma from the well-cooked viands is too alluring and he at once relents for the sake of a hearty meal.

TRYING TO GET ARRESTED.—Strange as it may seem the poor tramp, who is the hero of this Biograph comedy, finds it hard indeed to get pinched. There is no doubt he could have gotten work, but it is against the rules of his order. The cold weather is pretty trying and he wishes to get under cover, if it has to be in the "jug," so commits most ignoble and lawless deeds, but without success. The police simply ignore him, and often arrest an unoffending person in his stead. He becomes guilty of theft, assault, riot, disorderly conduct, and, in fact, everything but murder, but is still a bird of freedom. It's no use, so despondently he makes his way to the woodyard, resolving to go to work, when a copper meets him at the gate and arrests him—just when he didn't want it.

FATHER'S FIRST HALF HOLIDAY.—Father accepted "his first half holiday" with school boy enthusiasm. To make the occasion "memorable" he purchases theater tickets for the afternoon's performance. At home his plans for the day are heartily endorsed by his wife and son. Mother busy superintending the servant's removal of an unruly stove-pipe, is requested to dress at once, father volunteering to attend to the pipe. The clumsy servant is quickly ordered to the kitchen, and father grapples with his self-appointed task. The pipe almost proves his master. Broken bric-a-brac and soot-covered clothing bear witness to the measure of his success. Blinded with soot he dumps the pipe into the box with mother's new hat and starts with it for the cellar. Stumbling through the kitchen he falls into and ruins a rack of clean clothes. The falling pipe showers soot over the floor. Brushing it up he absently throws the soot into the flour barrel. Eventually the pipe is unloaded in the cellar—here father is horrified to find mother's hat crushed and dirty. Hearing footsteps he guiltily forces the ruined hat into the furnace and hides behind a barrel. The janitor, entering to attend to the furnace, finds the hat. Father, fearful of further complications, rushes out so forcefully to regain it that the janitor, terror-stricken, rushes from the cellar. Meanwhile, mother, dressing, uses sooty powder on her face. Little Robbie finds soot in his pockets and smears himself from head to foot. The servant in the kitchen is exasperated over a pan of black dough. The janitor runs frantically through the house. All meet in the dining room. Father's personal condition tells them the source of their misfortune. Explanations are useless—mother's anger at the loss of her new hat knows no bounds—father is roughly handled. The first half holiday ends in dasaster. Length, 700 feet.

UNAPPRECIATED GENIUS.—The poet is inspired. Stanza after stanza flows from his prolific pen. Reams of paper are consumed, covering the floor in a veritable white-capped sea of manuscript. The poem is nearly finished. Alas! an interruption. The world loses a masterpiece. Miss Gush, of the "Gaiety," has a new act. For a "try out" she selects the poet as her victim. Her interruption and voluble discussion of her probable "hit" causes him much annoyance. The further acrobatic delineation of her histrionic art forces him to "cover up" for self protection. Finally, after much tactful endeavor, he succeeds in forcing his strenuous visitor outside the door. Returning the poet finds his poem gradually disappearing through the transom. A paper-hanger next door, short of material, is using it to finish out a border. Grasping a pistol, the frenzied poet forces an entrance and finds his poem decorating the wall. The workman flees in alarm—the poet hastens to recover his own—his efforts are of little avail. As bit by bit is torn from the wall it sticks to his person. Despondent he sinks into a chair. During his absence the chore boy uses part of the poem to kindle the fire in the poet's room. The landlady, noticing the thinness of the poor poet's bed tick—with ready sympathy fills the tick with the balance of the poem. Recovering from his stupor the poet returns and finds the masterpiece missing. To him the charred bits on the grate tell the unhappy story. He succumbs to despair—the pistol suggests suicide—prepared for the end he sits on the poem-filled tick. The unusual softness temporarily diverts his mind. The strain has been too much—Nature claims her own. Sinking into its depths, the poet sleeps. Length, 200 feet.

A CUP OF TEA AND SHE.—Andres and his father, visiting the studio of a famous artist to inspect a new painting, is introduced to the beautiful model, who entertains and brews for him a cup of tea. It is a case of love at first sight. Afterward, they meet frequently, and in a month's time their engagement is announced. It proves a shock to his parents, who are of the "Four Hundred" and who have higher hopes for their son. His mother pleads with him to give up the girl, but without avail. In desperation she determines to see the girl and ask her to renounce the man she loves. The mother sends the model a letter and follows it herself to further plead. During the visit the girl is firm in her refusal, as she sincerely loves Andres and knows that it will break his heart if they are separated. When his mother leaves, however, she breaks down, overcome with the conviction that if they marry it will alter his social position. She writes to his mother, acquiescing to her demands, and determines on a plan which must cause him to cast her off. At the Bohemian supper in the studio, which they both attend, her actions are so extreme, and her treatment of him so harsh, that he retires perplexed and nearly broken-hearted. Andres' mother is gratified with the outcome of her "diplomacy," but fails to console her son. The girl is lost sight of. Andre never marries, but turns to business, and, it is believed, has forgotten entirely his only love affair. Five years later they meet again, for

She accidentally opens the doors of a private cabinet to find enshrined within the painting of herself that caused their first meeting. Andres returns to look the cabinet is recognized—but the scrub-woman in tears only bends the lower over her brush, and then he is gone forever. Length, 900 feet.

A TRIP TO THE WONDERLAND OF AMERICA, YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK. By Col. Edward Justus Parker. In all the world there is no more interesting resort for the tourist than the Yellowstone National Park. It is unique among the scenic regions of the world. It is the most wonderful natural phenomenon known to scientists. Its streams and valleys are not surpassed in beauty by any in the Old World. Words of description are trivial and weak compared with the overwhelming sensation produced by a first glimpse of this wonderland of the world. Yellowstone National Park is in the State of Wyoming, overlapping into Montana and Idaho, one thousand miles west of St. Paul and Minneapolis, amid the giant peaks of the American Rockies. It was first seen by a white man in 1807. John Colter, a member of the Lewis and Clark, expedition, found it. This fascinating region was set apart as a Government Reservation, to be known as Yellowstone Park, in 1872. The park proper is about 62 miles long, from north to south, and 54 miles wide. While the tourist may reach the park entrance by rail, it has been decreed by Uncle Sam that beyond the Great Lava Arch Gateway the iron horse shall not trespass. So here leaving the pathway of steel we take our place on one of the six-horse coaches that run from Gardiner up to Mammoth Hot Springs. Coaching Troops—Morris Basin—Great Fountain—Pack mules—Riverside Geyser—Old Faithful—Deer and Bear—Upper Falls—Canyon—Field Glasses. Standing on a balcony at Artist's Point we take up the field glass to have a tele-photo panorama of these weird walls with their clinging pine trees. We look down the Great Gorge. On either side walls of exquisite color rise with here and there pinnacle-like great church spires. Above our heads fly eagles who build their nests and raise their young on the top of these lofty peaks. The scene is a powerful one and beyond words, but the Great Falls add force and quality of action which tempers and dignifies the whole scene. This enormous volume of water that looks like a curtain of lace, tumbles over a cliff of volcanic rock 310 feet. Here the traveller finds himself spellbound, held by the pure beauty of the scene. In turning away he pauses to marvel at the wonders of nature and the beauties of our great national playground.

ANY PORT IN A STORM.—The comic adventures of the crew of the "Dill Pickle," who raided a farmer's chicken yard and who only escaped the wrath of the rube by a marvelous and mysterious feat in compression. I will let the picture tell its own story and I beg of you not to choke yourselves to death a-laughing.

PRODIGAL DAUGHTER.—In a peaceful little villa on the coast of an inland sea is located the home of a sturdy fisherman, whose hopes and joys are centered upon his daughter and only companion. All is happiness until one day tourists from the city meet the young lady and inveigle her into deserting her home for the allurements of city life. City life causes a complete transformation of the lady and she can scarcely be recognized as the same individual. At home, however, the father is bereft of reason and wanders aimlessly about, an object of pity. The novelty of city life soon wears off and, overcome with remorse, the woman seeks her old home only to find the building deserted. She learns the condition of her father and soon finds him in the village inn. When the poor man sees his daughter his reason returns and the daughter, as also her husband, unite with him for the happiness of all concerned. Length, 688 feet.

THE TRAMP AT THE MASQUERADE.—Walking along the street a young lord loses his invitation to a fancy dress ball at which only the nobility is to be present. A tramp seated near the walk perceives the lord drop the envelope and promptly appropriates it. His quick wit serves him well and he sees an opportunity for a good time without cost. Without making the least change in his appearance he presents himself at the address indicated in the invitation. He is received courteously and as his invitation is valid he is taken for the lord in disguise. Everybody is having a good time and our friend becomes decidedly popular when the young lord makes his appearance upon the scene. The tramp is upbraided, but the guests all plead for him as he has ingratiated himself with them and he is permitted to remain throughout the ball. Excellent comedy and perfect photography. Length, 589 feet.

THE RIVIERA.—All the thrills and delights of weeks of travel are experienced in a few moments. Scenes depicted are: Express Train Crossing Frontier—Road—Frontier Post—River Italian Custom House—Custom Officials at Work—French Custom House—Menton Sea Waves—of excellent photographic quality and most interesting in every detail. Length, 297 feet.

HE ADVERTISED FOR HIS DOG.—Pet dogs have ever been the source of endless amusement and in the present instance a canine of rare variety, through his absence, gives rise to one of the best comedies yet produced. A connoisseur, having lost his prize dog, advertises a liberal reward for its return. People seeing the notice look up dogs of every description, known and unknown pedigrees, and bring them to claim the reward. At the apartment house where the notice is posted several tenants are overcome by consternation when the claimants file in upon them. When the advertiser is finally located and he examines all the dogs brought in for his inspection, but does not identify any one of them, he is proclaimed an impostor and set upon by the disappointed throng. He seeks safety in flight and a lively chase results. An automobile is pressed into service, but to no avail, and the poor fellow takes refuge in a tree. Efforts to follow are most successfully combated and will not fail to cause vociferous applause. Here he roosts all night. When he awakens the next morning he finds his pursuers encamped at the foot of the tree. Refreshed by his night's rest, he climbs from his perch and makes a successful dash for liberty. Length, 354 feet.

ON THE BRINK OF THE PRECIPICE.—This subject very agreeably combines the delights of an Alpine tour and the thrills of a romance enacted under the most favorable and natural conditions. The principal characters are: Mr. and Mrs. Arnold, their daughter Jeanne, a Mr. Rogers and Mr. Marcel, a cavalry officer. Two young men are in love with Jeanne, but Jeanne has a decided preference for the suave young officer and does not lose an opportunity to display her wishes—whereas the parents look very kindly upon Mr. Rogers. The following day the entire party arrange for an excursion to the mountain peaks. Arrived at the summit of the mountain, all are in ecstasies over the beauty of the panorama. Jeanne sees a wild flower she would like to have and Marcel does not hesitate to attempt to secure it for her. Unfortunately he slips and falls over the ledge. Guides promptly come to the rescue and find Marcel caught in a fissure not far below, a rope is lowered and fastened about him, but when he is near the top a jealous passion overcomes Rogers and he makes an effort to cut the rope on which Marcel is supported over the gulf. His rash act is prevented by the quick interception of Jeanne. Roger's folly causes his disgrace. The young officer wins the approval of the Arnolds and his engagement to pretty Jeanne is soon announced. Length, 562 feet.

INVITING HIS BOSS FOR DINNER.—The chief clerk of a mercantile establishment has been honored by the acceptance of his invitation to his superior to dinner. Upon arriving at his home he causes consternation to his wife and the maid in his efforts to assist to tidy up the home and make the dinner a success. The cook is criticised in her work and receives many jolts as to requirements in the culinary art. The latter dignitary is to receive the guest and needs some considerable training which provokes an encounter between herself and madam. The maid threatens to quit and it requires profound apologies from the mistress and an extra five dollars from the head of the house before she consents to resume her work. The sound of the bell calls the maid to the door and the host and hostess assume their respective positions with a feigned ease to receive their guest, but instead a telegram arrives expressing regrets, etc., but the boss will be unable to be present. Excellent detail and perfect work by the artists posing for this subject. Length, 304 feet.

PATHE FRERES.

THE KISS OF JUDAS.—The opening scene of this sacred picture shows the interior of the home of Mark, where Jesus and his apostles have gathered to eat the Paschal lamb. The sacred feast is spread and the little band take their places at the table with the Master in the center, who addresses his friends in words of love, saying: "These things I command you, that you love one another!" Jesus then takes a towel and basin and sinks upon his knees to wash the feet of his apostles. Some of them object that the Master should humble himself so, but Jesus insists in order to teach them a lesson in humility. Coming to Judas, who is seated at the extreme end of the table with a sneering look on his face, Jesus bends and bathes his feet, but the latter lends himself with bad grace to the humble ceremony. The mercenary creature is ill at ease and drops his purse on the floor, whereupon Jesus picks it up and hands it back to him. Judas then opens the purse and shows his brethren how impoverished he is, for it is empty. Jesus again takes his place at the table, where, after breaking some bread, he passes it around, saying, "This is my body;" then taking a cup of wine he drinks and passes it also, saying, "This is my blood!" During the meal a bitter anxiety seems to hang over the little band, and Jesus is so deeply wrung with agony that he turns to those about him and says: "Verily, verily, I say unto you that one of you is about to betray me!" Immediately there is great consternation among the band and each apostle asks: "Lord is it I?" Even Judas joins with the others with inconceivable heartlessness and effrontery, asking also, "Lord is it I?" To which the Master makes answer: "Yes, it is you who shall betray me!" The other apostles on hearing this start in anger towards Judas, but Jesus, raising his hand, quells the disturbance, whereupon Judas arises from the table and defiantly leaves the room. At the approach of midnight, Jesus and his apostles leave the house and make their way to the Garden of Olives, where Jesus goes to pray. Judas, knowing that the Master would be there, manages to get to the garden first with the officers from the chief priests and Pharisees. After closing his bargain and receiving the money for his part in the treachery, Judas instructs the multitude to hide and come forth in due time and seize the man whom he shall kiss upon the cheek. Presently Jesus approaches with his apostles, and forthwith Judas greets him, saying: "Hail, Master!" and kisses him. The soldiers rush out from their hiding place and seize Jesus, and take him prisoner, while his apostles flee in terror. Judas is now seen standing with remorse and terror written on his countenance, and, as the soldiers retire with their innocent prisoner, the traitor falls in agony to the ground. Suddenly raising himself on his elbow he begins counting over the money he received for his part in the affair. Then, realizing all at once the enormity of his crime, the traitor becomes seized with undescribable remorse and writhes on the ground in agony, laughing, crying and praying to God for mercy. In his fancy he sees a vision of Jesus coming to him with compassion in his eyes and extending his hands in forgiveness. Unable to bear the terrible remorse any longer the traitor takes a rope hanging over a tree branch, slips the noose around his neck and thus ends his miserable existence. Length, 676 feet.

VERCINGETORIX—GAUL'S HERO.—The subject of this beautifully colored picture is the great Gaulish chieftain, Vercingetorix, of the tribe of Arverni. He was a powerful adversary of Caesar and was continually perpetrating hostilities against the mighty monarch. In the first view Gaul's hero is seen among his own people, who honor and respect him for his valiant deeds. Many times has he led them in battle against the Romans, and each time has he come out victorious. Now, however, after a long siege, we see the brave Gaul shut up in Alesia where Caesar's army, after a prolonged battle, eventually capture the powerful fortress and take Vercingetorix a prisoner. The latter is led before his hated enemy, Caesar, where he surrenders and, instead of being extended the usual courtesy that is due to the vanquished, Caesar has his prisoner bound in chains and keeps him captive in the camp, where Vercingetorix is compelled to witness many ghastly deeds perpetrated against his own people. In one scene he is led into the great arena, where he is forced to witness Caesar enter in triumph and in full power, while he is thrown to the ground like an animal and made to bear the jeers of the vast multitude. Finally when Caesar feels that he has tortured his prisoner quite enough and, wishing to be rid of him, he sends two powerful men to the cell, where Vercingetorix is con-

MOSCOW CLAD IN SNOW.—This is another one of our famous scenic films which is a revelation of the beauties of the historic Russian city, showing it clad in a blanket of snow and giving us a good view of the many points of interest in and about the place. We get a good view of the famous old Kremelin from different angles, then a view of the city taken from one of the high towers. Next we see Petrovsky Park and some of the main thoroughfares during a heavy blizzard in which the inhabitants go about well muffled up and seemingly undaunted by the severe cold atmosphere. Length, 450 feet.

PONTO RUNS AWAY WITH THE MILK CART.—A woman who is delivering milk enters the house of one of her customers, leaving her little cart, to which she has a dog attached, at the curb. Presently a fellow comes along and, after spilling the contents of the cans all over the street, he gets on the cart and away goes the dog down the street, dragging his cart containing the unwelcome burden. Coming out of the place, the woman misses her wagon, so starts in pursuit of the outfit. The dog tosses madly on, cutting through everything that is in his path and causing no end of excitement in the very tranquil town where all the inhabitants, seemingly wishing for a little diversion, start in pursuit and are the witnesses to many miraculous escapes on the part of the dog and his driver. Finally after a long and expensive chase the outfit runs into the arms of a police officer, who puts an abrupt stop to the fracas, and holds the mischievous fellow for the pursuing crowd, who take him in hands and mete out to him a thorough chastisement for his reckless pranks. Length, 253 feet.

ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL.—An officer in the navy is seen taking leave of his pretty daughter as he boards the ship to sail away to foreign ports, and soon we see the sea lion as it steams out of port into the open sea, leaving the tearful lass alone to wait patiently for her kind parent's return. As she is about to go, she is approached by a man friend, who offers her his arm and the couple stroll away, he accompanying her to her home. It is very evident that the couple are deeply in love and all the time of her father's absence they spend a great deal of time in each other's company, the girl happily listening to the youth's declarations of his love for her. One day when her father returns unexpectedly, he finds his daughter reading a note, and upon investigation discovers that it is from her lover, who tells her to meet him at their usual rendezvous. In foreign countries it is a breach of honor for a young man to meet a lady clandestinely and unchaperoned, and with this breach of etiquette in view, the enraged father goes to the meeting place, instead of his daughter, whom he denounces and leaves in tears. The two men meet, and when the youth tries to explain the old man will not listen to reason, but challenges him to a duel, which is arranged for the following day. At the appointed time the contestants meet, and choose their revolvers, and at the signal they fire, but the young man shoots in the air, and luckily, the old fellow misses his mark. When the latter sees the attitude of the young lover, he becomes softened, and grabbing the youth by the hand, promises to let him marry his daughter. Great was the surprise of the heart-broken girl when her father and lover enter the room together, and she is presented to her future husband with the old man's blessings. Length, 479 feet.

WHEN LOVE WILL.—This film unfolds an interesting fairy tale, in which a youth, who is in love with a pretty maiden, meets with the favor of the Fairy Queen, who assists him in his difficulties in winning the hand of the girl. The latter while strolling in the garden is approached by her ardent suitor who makes love to her, but she spurns his entreaties telling him that she will never marry him unless he can change the roses growing in her garden into human beings. The distracted lover takes a rose to his room, and while he is enjoying its sweet fragrance, the Fairy Queen appears and directs him to go to a garden, where he finds a magic wand. When he waves the latter he finds himself in a beautiful garden surrounded by hundreds of fragrant roses. In one of the flower beds he sees some pretty little fairies who present him with a beautiful gold casket. The Queen tells him to take one of the roses, place it in the box and then give the latter to his sweetheart. He follows the Queen's instructions and when the maiden opens the box she sees a beautiful flower bed where all the flowers have taken life and with their smiling faces are interceding for the young lover. The happy girl is perfectly satisfied with the results and keeps her promise, thereby making the youth happy for life. Length, 475 feet.

LITTLE CYRIL, THE RUNAWAY.—This drama tells a story of a lad whose home life is made unbearable on account of his drunken father's brutality. One morning, when he has finished his chores, Cyril starts for school, but never arrives there, as he wanders down to the sea front, where, by chance, he secures a position on one of the outgoing freight boats. He returns to bid his sweetheart good-bye before starting on his long journey. During his absence his poor mother's life is made unbearable by her husband's love for liquor, until one day sometime after the boy's departure, the worthless old man passes away, leaving her alone in the world. Ten years have elapsed now since Cyril went away and in that time his mother's health has become impaired and she is forced to give up her little home, and so be turned out into the street. Cyril returns just at this time, a dashing youth who has raised himself to the position of captain of the ship. As soon as he steps on shore he starts for the old home and meets his sweetheart of former days, who has developed into a beautiful young lady. The happy young couple arrive at his mother's home just as the process servers are about to auction off all of her earthly belongings. Great was his mother's surprise when she recognized her own son in the uniform of a captain, and he, taking in the situation at a glance, immediately produces a large roll of bills and pays her indebtedness, giving orders to have the furniture returned to the home, where he once more joins his happy mother. Length, 695 feet.

HELP! POLICE!—A young lady visits her friend and invites her to a masquerade ball. They both conclude to go. They dress up as policemen and visit the hall where they make a big hit with the girls. At 3 A. M. The young ladies are on their way home. Two tramps rush past them followed by two gentlemen. The latter seeing the policemen tell them what happened and asked them to chase the tramps. Instead of doing this the two frightened girls run away in the opposite direction. Rounding a corner they run into a milkman. On their mad rush they run into the baker, they overturn the newsboys distributing the morning papers, they run into ladies and gentlemen coming home from the ball. All these in turn chase the masqueraders who try to reach home. At last they got there, they find a policeman asleep on the step and another one asleep leaning on the telegraph pole. The young ladies quietly slip into the house. Just then the crowd comes. Seeing the two policemen they think they are those whom they were pursuing and give them a good sound thrashing while the two young ladies look out of the window hugely enjoying the joke.—Length, 450 feet.

THE PHOTOGRAPH HABIT.—Charles is photograph mad. He photographs everything and anything. While doing this he is run down by an automobile. While photographing a young couple he tumbles backwards down an embankment. He is nearly run down by a train. He is held up by two toughs and nearly killed by a bicyclist but all this cannot down his photograph habit and he is still at it. Length, 340 feet.

THE GUARDING ANGEL.—The nurse brings the little baby to her mother to kiss her good-bye. She then places the baby in the carriage and sends the little one away in charge of the maid.

The Consequences of Carelessness.—On a high point in the park overlooking the city near a precipice sits the maid, reading. Next to her stands the baby carriage. Suddenly the carriage slips away—down the precipice. The maid runs to the rock's edge. Seeing the carriage on its downward path she drops to the ground faintingly. At the bottom of the pricipice is a gypsy camp. The garding angel held its protecting hand over the child and guided her safely into the gypsy camp. The gypsies quickly take the little girl in their tent, change the clothes and throw the baby carriage into the nearby stream, thus creating the impression that the baby has been drowned.

They Think Little Mary Was Drowned.—The nurse, still in a dead faint, has been found by the park guard. She tells him what happened and they both run down to the river's edge, where they find the carriage, which they bring home to the unfortunate mother, who upon hearing the sad news flies at the girl in a frantic rage.

The Child's Angel.—The gypsies take the girl's clothes and hide them in the hollow of a tree while the angel stands guarding over the little child.

Fifteen Years Later.—The gypsies have settled down. They weave baskets, which little Mary, who is now sixteen years old, sells for them. Business is good, as everybody buys of Mary, whose charms are captivating. Wherever she goes she is protected by the guarding angel.

"Mary," Says the Angel, "Thou Shalt Find Thy Parents."—In her sleep the angel appears to Mary and shows her in a vision how she had been found by gypsies and where they put the clothes which she wore. The angel appears on another night.

The Third Night: "Mary," Says the Angel, "Follow Me." The third night the angel again appears, saying to Mary, "Follow Me." The angel guides Mary to the hollow of the tree. Mary finds her clothes, locket and chain and while the vision disappears Mary wraps all in a bundle and quickly returns home.

"We Will Bring You to Your Parents."—Mary tells the gypsies how she heard of her parents and of the appearance of the angel. Then they decide to bring Mary to her real parents.

"We Kept the Secret Because We Loved Her So."—The gypsies tell the parents the story, how Mary was lost and how they found her. They often wanted to return the little girl to her parents, but they never could make up their minds to give her up because they loved Mary so, they said.

"I Have Love Enough for All of You."—The parents are overjoyed to have found again their little daughter. Mary, however, does not wish to lose altogether the old couple that were good to her all these years and she therefore begs her newly found parents to keep the old couple near them. "I have love enough for all of you," she says, and from the way the parents kiss her it may be seen that her first wish has been granted. Length, 750 feet.

BROTHER AGAINST BROTHER: A Story of the Civil War. John and Allen Grigsby, brothers, own and operate a general store at Hopkinsville, Ky., and our opening scene occurs on the wedding day of Allen, the younger brother. The wedding party are gathered at the home of Judge Hopkins, whose pretty daughter is the prospective bride. Word has been received that the first shot has been fired at Fort Sumter, and even in the midst of the wedding festivities the conversation of the excited guests turns to the talk of war and its possibilities. The judge has drawn up a document which he is going to ask his neighbors to sign, declaring their allegiance to the Southern cause. All the men are asked to meet at the Grigsby Brothers' store two weeks after the wedding, prepared to declare their principles and to sign or refuse to, the oath of allegiance. The guests then depart for the village church to witness the wedding ceremony.

The second scene occurs two weeks later, showing in a faithful manner the interior of a village store in Kentucky in 1861. Young Allen signs the oath of allegiance and calls his brother to do the same. His brother reads it slowly and hands it back again, saying: "I am sorry, Allen, but I cannot sign that paper." The hot-headed boy can scarcely believe what he hears. "Do you mean you are going against me? Against our own people?" "I am going to do what I think is right, Allen." With an oath the younger brother springs at John's throat, but the neighbors separate them and lead Allen from the place.

Four Years Later—On the Rappahannock.—The Confederate regiment with which Allen Grigsby is serving as a captain has been trapped—the Federals have closed in on all sides of them. The Union troops, sure of their prey and anticipating an attack from the redoubtable Jackson, are playing a waiting game. The Confederate colonel, knowing that Jackson is but five miles away, calls for a volunteer to get through the enemy's lines and apprise Jackson of his predicament. Allen is selected, and disguised as a Union officer starts on his dangerous mission. A Union spy directs Allen to take a road leading towards the Federal's main camp, and then hastily notifies Colonel John Grigsby, who sends a lieutenant with a squad of cavalry to capture the spy. An exciting scene follows, for Allen puts up a brave fight, but, overwhelmed by numbers, he is marched off to the temporary stockade prison, where our next scene occurs. Colonel John Grigsby is in command of the regiment which is stationed at the prison, and receiving an order from the brigade commander he enters and calls the number Allen is known by. He then reads to him the fateful order, "Execute at sunrise." As Allen stands up to hear his sentence, John sees his prisoner for the first time. With a cry of horror he recognizes his own brother. John Grigsby now stands face to face with one of the strangest of all war possibilities. He as the commanding officer must punish with death the spy captured within his own lines, and that spy is his own brother. The stricken man offers his hand to Allen. "A man does not shake hands with his executioner," is Allen's reply to his offer.

The Soldier's Dream.—During the night, which Allen feels to be his last on earth, a vision comes to him. He sees the girl wife he left behind in old Kentucky. Allen, shaken by the vision of his wife and boy, relates the dream to John and pleads for his liberty that he may go to them.

A Brother's Sacrifice.—Suddenly a plan forms itself in John's mind. "I can't and won't let him die like a dog." He acts at once, and unbuckling his sabre and revolver belt, strips off his uniform coat and quickly puts them on Allen, gives him the password, and then with quiet intensity says: "My horse is outside. Ride straight ahead until you reach the river, then keep the Shell road to Warrensburg. It's only five miles. Jackson is encamped there. Stop, give me that revolver; I may need it. I'll give you five minutes' start, anyway." The brothers clasp hands, and Allen, disguised, darts out of the door. John listens until the clatter of the horse's feet dies out, then deliberately shoots himself in the shoulder. The report of the revolver shot brings the guard, who, seeing his commander wounded and the prisoner gone, rushes to the officers' quarters for help. When they arrive John feigns unconsciousness and thus gains a few precious moments for Allen. Finally he tells the anxious officers that, being unable to sleep, he called to get the address of the condemned man's friends so that he might write them of his fate. That he was met by a stern refusal, and that as he turned to leave the man sprang upon him, and in the struggle he was shot and lost consciousness. The camp is aroused, but Allen, mounted on Colonel Grigsby' big bay, leaves all pursuit behind and makes good his escape.

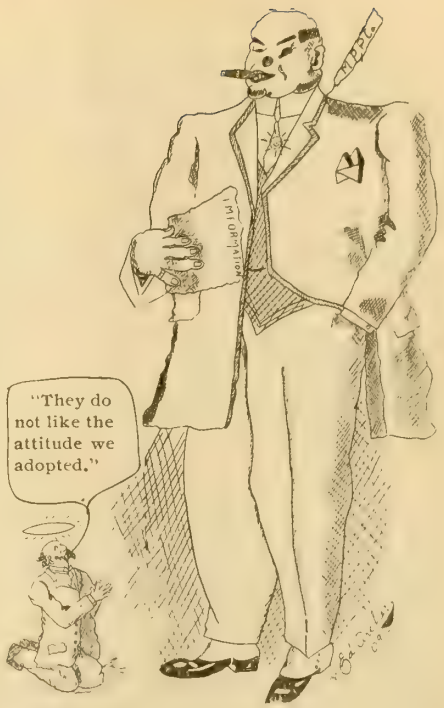
Three Months Later—The Fight at Buckton's Bridge.—During the action Colonel John Grigsby leads a charge against the infantry massed at the enemy's end of the bridge. A young Confederate officer, with his regiment' colors in his left hand, leaps out in front of his kneeling men to steady them against the Federal attack. Colonel Grigsby gives the order, "Draw sabres! Charge!" The grey line breaks and gives way in spite of the young officer's pleading. The boys in blue with a yell of triumph dash for the captured end of the bridge, firing as they come. Colonel John sees the brave Confederate flag bearer stagger. He orders his men to cease firing and goes himself to the officer's assistance. As he lowers the wounded man to the ground he is horrified to find that he is looking into the face of his own brother. "It's the fortune of war, John. Good-bye; take care of Laura and my boy." And young Allen Grigsby dies in his brother's arms.

Two Years Later.—Allen Grigsby's Widow Recognizes Her Husband's Brother.—Her heart is bitter towards him at first, but his worn face and the sorrow in his voice softens her anger. "Laura, the war is ended. Can't we be friends? It was his wish, for he died in my arms. Fell fighting for the cause he thought was right." She gives him her hand. The breach is healed. He gives the widow her husband's last message, and with bowed and reverent head the sorrow-stricken woman murmurs, "Father in Heaven, Thy will be done."

A picture story full of the pathos that grips the heart. The kind of a story that will livealways.

CENTAUR FILM CO.

A COWBOY'S SWEETHEART. -The opening scene shows Dick bidding his sweetheart Jane good-bye in front of her log cabin home. She playfully scolds him and waves good-bye as he leaves. Black Folsom and his hard-looking gang of cowboys ride on the scene and he attempts to flirt with Jane. She modestly withdraws into the cabin, while the cowboys ride on to the village tavern, where we see them enjoying themselves, and after leaving the saloon they go back to the log cabin, where Black Folsom goes in and finds Jane just putting on her hat, about to leave. He attempts to kiss her, which she resents by slapping him in the face, and he, in his rage, grabs her and rushes outside, where one of his mates binds her arms and lifts her up onto Folsom's horse, and they ride away. Dick returns, finds the cabin deserted, indications of a struggle, and horses' hoof marks outside, and follows on his horse. We then see the cowboys riding through the woods with Jane, and in this scene Folsom, in his half-drunken condition, lets Jane slip from his arms to the ground while galloping at full speed. He returns and picks her up without dismounting, and then proceeds. We then see Dick coming over the same ground in pursuit, and the next scene shows Folsom and his gang in camp, with Jane bound and lying on the ground. The cowboys are asleep, with the exception of a sentry, who is making up the camp fire, when Dick crawling on his hands and knees, appears on the scene and, knocking the sentry down, releases Jane, who runs to the horses and, mounting one, rides away. Dick is about to do the same when the sentry, recovering from the blow, gives the alarm, and Folsom and his gang rush to him before he can draw his gun. They capture him and some of the boys hold him while Folsom is about to shoot him, when a diabolical plan enters his head and he decides to have him put in quicksand, which is near at hand. The next scene shows the quicksand, with the cowboys approaching with Dick in the midst, and going as near the quicksand as they dare, they push him forward, and in spite of his struggles he lands in the place where they desire him to be and is seen slowly sinking as Folsom's gang go off the scene. Jane has been watching the operations of the gang, and as soon as it is safe, she approaches on her hands and knees and attempts to help Dick, who is in the greatest agony, but he values the life of his sweetheart more highly than he does his own and he begs of her not to come near him. She discovers a lariat which one of the Folsom gang had left, and making a noose she draws it about his body and attempts to haul him out, but it is too much for her strength, and discovering the limb of a tree hanging over the quicksand, she draws it over the limb and makes it fast to the tree and then rushes away for help. We then see her galloping back to the settlement in search of help, and then see her riding with friends of Dick to his rescue. They arrive at the quicksand, and while two of them haul him up with the rope, Jane and another one throw a rope about his back and drag him from over the quicksand. They lower him to hard ground, and the picture closes with Jane and Dick in loving embrace, receiving the congratulations of the other cowboys.



I am in the market for a moving picture opportunity. The business must be one that will bear the closest investigation, and now in a profitable condition. Perfer location in some manufacturing City of 20,000 population that is growing.

THE WINNING COAT

Although it may be said in truth that the coat does not make the man, still it went a great way towards righting the wrongs of the hero of this pretty romance of the Sixteenth Century period. A young courtier is arrested for duelling, but paroled. He breaks his parole to see his sweetheart, a lady of the Court. He is caught, stripped of his regalia and banished from Court. Despondent, he goes to the tavern and whiles away the time gambling. He cleans out his adversary, even to winning his coat. In the pocket of this coat he finds a letter plotting the abduction of the Queen. With this information he succeeds in thwarting the design and not only wins the King's pardon and esteem but the hand of his sweetheart as well. Length, 767 feet.

A SOUND SLEEPER

This is a very funny short comedy, showing a lazy tramp, who for somniferous qualities could beat Rip Van Winkle to a frazzle. After many adventures he falls to sleep in an ash barrel, is covered with ashes and taken to the ash dump, where he is deposited—still asleep. Having completed his devotions at the shrine of Morpheus, he gets up, brushes his coat off with a pocket whisk and saunters off. Length, 214 feet.

RELEASED APRIL 15, 1909.

CONFIDENCE

A beautiful story of true love, showing the confidence a husband placed in his wife. An orphan girl of a Western rancho, flattered by the attentions of a well-dressed habitue of the place, fancied she loved him. He was a cold-hearted gambler and the girl soon realizes his true character, as well as that of most of the people of the place, and decides to break away and seek a higher and nobler life. With this intent she goes East and gets employment as nurse in a hospital. Her kind, sweet disposition endears her to all those under her care, as well as impressing the head surgeon. He, in time, falls deeply in love with her and makes her his wife. Her life is one of sunshine until the gambler comes East and accidentally learns her whereabouts. Here is a chance for him, too good to lose, so armed with her innocent love letters he extorts money from her. When she has none to give him, he hands the letters to her husband, who casts them unread into the fire and has the brute thrown from the house. Length, 973 feet.

"CHARLIE FORCED TO FIND A JOB"

Comedy. Approx. Length, 539 feet.

RELEASE, TUESDAY, APRIL 13, 1909.

"Father is rich and mother don't care" is adequately demonstrated in this series of views. Accustomed to having all expenses paid and "painting the town" to his heart's delight, Charlie is "stung" when, after an unusual carousal, the parental remonstrances to his rapid pace are so marked and effective that he finds himself on the outside of his heretofore "Garden of Eden."

Various efforts are made to secure funds to maintain a living, but Charlie is unsuccessful and goes from bad to worse. However, he manages to make his several attempts at times when his parents are present, much to their humiliation and disgust.

What was intended for a punishment for Charlie has a reactionary effect upon his family and they sue for peace. All possible concessions are made and every inducement offered if he will only return.

Good quality and perfect dramatization.

"IN THE LIME LIGHT"

Comedy. Approx. Length, 589 feet.

RELEASE, TUESDAY, APRIL 13, 1909.

This subject is a novelty of highest order and will not fail to produce wholesome amusement. A street fakir is seen to extoll the virtues of an improved mechanism for which he claims unlimited qualities.

He induces a maiden to look into the apparatus with a view of seeing her future husband. A young hopeful wishes to see his prospective wife. Another desiring to prove his pedigree calls for views of his ancestors. A fourth person has a yearning to see what his children will be like, and finally an inquisitive man is imbued with the desire to see his mother-in-law.

All are satisfied so far as the mere satisfaction of their curiosity is concerned, but far from being pleased with the realization of their ideals. The caricatures of the crayon artist order are grotesque and highly amusing.

"UNDER SUSPICION"

Drama. Approx. Length, 589 feet.

RELEASE, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 14, 1909.

This story illustrates in a very effective manner the anguish undergone by a person of jealous disposition. The devoted wife and child are planning for a celebration on the event of papa's birthday. Father is requested to go on an errand while the two lay their plans; later he surprises the daughter writing a letter; a gold-handled cane, intended as a gift, carelessly left on the lawn by the servant, who hurries away at the sound of his master's approaching footsteps, and unexpectedly coming upon his wife picking a bouquet, cause jealousy to arise in the man's heart. Never dreaming that what he deems evidence of infelicity is really evidence of love and devotion, when the morning of his birthday dawns his demeanor is sullen. The surprise awaiting him in the demonstrations of affection is overwhelming and he shamefacedly accepts the offerings and vows never again to permit distrust to dominate his actions.

"POLICEMAN IN ACTION"

Comedy. Approx. Length, 367 feet.

RELEASE, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 14, 1909.

A rip-roaring comedy is rendered in the specific action brought about by a policeman, who, in answer to an advertisement, secures a pair of electric boots.

Unfortunately the appliances are put in connection with a trolley wire and generate an enormous power and the officer loses control of himself.

The funny incidents are too numerous to permit description in the short space available, but we can without hesitancy state that it is unquestionably one of the best comedy subjects ever produced.

URBAN-ECLIPSE FILMS

"A PLOT FOILED"

Drama. Approx. Length, 354 feet.

RELEASE, SATURDAY, APRIL 17, 1909.

A little shepherd lad engaged at his work in the pasture overhears a plot to rob his master. He is detected by the conspirators, but feigning sleep is not molested. After the men have left to carry out their diabolical plot he hurries back to the house and through the window he sees the men at work. He quickly secures a shotgun from the storeroom and firing through the window he hits one of the men in the foot and causes them to seek safety in flight.

He liberates his employer and sounds the alarm, whereupon the police arrive and pursue the fleeing culprits, who are soon apprehended.

The lad wins the well-merited praise of his master and the latter also appreciates that in the boy he has a very desirable employee.

"A BACHELOR'S PERSISTENCE"

Comedy. Approx. Length, 555 feet.

RELEASE, SATURDAY, APRIL 17, 1909.

That "persistency conquers" is very aptly demonstrated in this series of views. A confirmed bachelor, possessed of all the attributes and characteristics of a charter member of his class, falls a victim to the unerring darts of Dan Cupid and with the same persistence with which he previously sought to evade the meshes of matrimonial entanglements he now strives to enter the realm of connubial bliss.

He serenades the object of his affection, offers gifts of every description, and seeks by every possible means to ingratiate himself with the young lady. All efforts are unavailing; he is ordered from the premises, expulsed and subjected to all manner of humiliation, but instead of his ardor being dampened he is spurred on all the more to accomplish his purpose.

Finally fate smiles kindly upon him and he is given the opportunity to prove himself the hero in a thrilling rescue scene. For this he is received with open arms and both live happy ever after.

Are English Films Barred in America?

There is a letter published in a London contemporary stating that in recent demonstrations of Independent film in the United States no English films were shown, nor was any opportunity given to order them. It is suggested that the English manufacturers are not getting their share of American trade, which is being given over to the French and Italian makers. The complainant states that every firm who has tried to sell English films in America had to give up the sale because they are not properly advertised.

This information comes from an American source, which we are unable to locate, but we think is well grounded. Having regard to the fact that England has a larger number of first class manufacturers of films than any other country, and what is more to the point, produces work not inferior to that made elsewhere, it is surprising that there is such a paucity of English subjects shown.

In recent demonstrations in this city of Independent importations, we were struck by the comparative lack of English subjects. We happen to know that there is room for more, but probably the right means are not adopted for securing them. The real reason, however, why English films are not better known here is that though some agencies exist, very little effort is made to push the pictures and, moreover, those people who handle the films either will not or do not advertise them. If they were given the proper chance in this country, properly described, properly advertised, there would be, we are convinced, a strong demand for them, entirely on their protographic and dramatic merits. One firm we have in mind which long held an English agency appears to have gone out of the business for reasons not unconnected with recent occurrences.

The International Projecting and Producing Company handle the products of eight English firms, but so far do not seem to be advertising them as freely, clearly and descriptively as they might. We know the work and therefore we are in a position to point out what is lacking in the exploitation of the films. It is rather a pity that English subjects are not better known, because they are, in the majority of cases, more likely to be to the taste of the average American audience and much of the work of continental Europe. A visit to the exhibition of Lyman H. Howe most clearly brings this home to everybody on the side, therefore, "trust" versus Independent controversy apart, we think it worth while to suggest to the moving picture trade in America that there is ample scope for the introduction of good English films. Certainly they are not bad. There is no reason why they should be bad. But if they are properly exploited, advertised and explained, they are just as likely to be as popular and profitable as English plays, players, books and many other productions of the British Isles.

Untitled junk and plenty of it in moving picture houses has recently come under our notice much to our disgust, and that of the public, who, like ourselves, always pay for our entertainment. We do not like it nor do our fellow appreciators of moving pictures. Only last week we had occasion to single out for reference a theater which is being run on these lines, and if we come across others, we shall not hesitate to brand the effete, rainy, defective film subjects which are foisted upon a long suffering public by unscrupulous exhibitors. The battle for quality amongst the manufacturers should find its counterpart amongst the exhibitors. If they fail in give the public the latest and best, then, on their part, the public will fail, and the moving picture will go to the dogs. A fate from which we will do our best to save it.

The announcement made by the Motion Picture Patents Company that they have been instrumental in securing a reasonable rate of accident insurance, or even to get the insurance people to accept the risks, should show the exhibitor and exchange man that this company is not idle in their behalf. This is only one of many moves that are being made by them to place the moving picture business on a better footing. It should be also noted that an officer of the company has spent considerable time at Albany to block the passage of certain proposed legislation which would seriously cripple the moving picture interests if allowed to become law. He addressed the committees in both houses of representatives and his work has resulted in clearing away many false impressions in the minds of the legislators and in the dissemination of many favorable press comments instead of the harmful attacks which they have heretofore published. This is one of the uses to which the exhibitor's license fee is being wisely applied.

By Thomas Bedding, F. R. P. S.

CHAPTER V.

The Lens.

In the purely photographic part of moving picture work the instrument which is of first importance is the lens. Lens and camera are sometimes lumped together under the generic term of "camera," but this is a wrong way of looking at the matter. The lens is virtually the eye of the system used for taking the negative; the camera we may regard as the outer receptacle; whilst the film answers to the retina of the human eye. Between the eye and lens, camera and film, there is a perfect parallel which can be further explained. Roughly the outper part of the eye consists of a lens, the hollow part answers to a camera, and the back of it answers to the sensitive surface. These three essentials have their counter parts, or analogues, in the moving picture lens and camera, as the reader can now see for himself. Similarly, if the crystalline lens of the human eye is defective in any way, so will the image which is received on the retina, and then transmitted by the optic nerve to the brain, be also defective. In other words, we shall have what is commonly known as bad sight. We must wear properly corrected glasses to remedy it.

Now, by the very process of reasoning here suggested, the reader who is interested in the making of moving pictures will realize that too much importance cannot be attached to the qualities of the lens, which is used either for taking the picture or projecting it on the screen. If it is deficient in the necessary optical qualities, then either the negative will be optically bad, or the picture on the screen will be bad.

If I developed all the optical considerations which are involved in this branch of my subject to the length I would like, I should take up too many pages of this publication. The optics of photography have long been a favorite study of mine, and it is one of the rarest pleasures in the world for me to write of them, or to do work in connection with it. For these reasons, therefore, I am obliged to condense this section of the subject into a very small space, and to ask the reader to believe what I say as the outcome of many years' experience in the work. Meanwhile, for those anxious to go into the superficial theories of optics, as applied to moving picture making and projecting, I would recommend them to procure of Messrs. Tennant & Ward, East Twenty-fifth street, New York City, publishers of photographic books, some of their latest handbooks on the subject. They will well repay study by the serious worker.

I know some of the difficulties which the makers of moving pictures experience at the lens end of the subject. On my arrival in New York City one of the first men I met was a well-known moving picture expert, who consulted me on this subject. He wanted to know why a certain noted firm was producing such well defined pictures which show beautifully sharp, crisp, clear images under very great magnification on the screen. I had no difficulty in proving to him that, to quote the well-known advertisement, "it is all in the lens." The work that he admired was produced by a properly calculated and corrected optical instrument, whereas the lens that he himself was using was an inferior instrument made by what mathematical opticians contemptuously characterize as "rule of thumb."

He was using what is known as a cheap French lens instead of well made instruments by such renowned houses as Ross, Goerz, Voightlander, Dallmeyer, Taylor, Taylor & Hobson, Bausch & Lomb or Gundlach-Manhattan. The production of a perfect lens for moving picture or photographic work is a matter of the highest scientific skill. Remember that its function is to transmit to the film a microscopically sharp image which shall stand amplification or enlargement to many hundreds of diameters. Supposing, for example, that our miniature picture was projected onto a twenty-foot screen; then we have a lineature magnification or enlargement of about 240 times, which must not show appreciable loss of detail or sharpness. Considering that in ordinary photographic work magnification of from ten to twenty times is considered somewhat out of the common, and that ordinary lantern slide projection only runs to one-quarter the size of moving picture projection, it will be understood how important it is that moving picture negatives should be made under the best optical conditions.

I earnestly advise that the moving picture maker should carefully avoid cheap lenses for this work, or others which have not the name of a reputable optician upon them (I have given those names in a previous paragraph), because these cheap lenses, though pretty to look at and producing fairly good results, yet fail in the main essential of critical definition or, as it has been called, "razor edge sharpness." The lens should give a perfectly flat field from the original subject. The original is mostly the stage, having comparatively little depth, unless the work is done out of doors, when infinity, that is, the most distant part of the picture, is situated a long way off. For all optical purposes most moving picture subjects can be treated as lying virtually in one plane of definition, and so a lens which is corrected for flatness of field is best used. There are some persons, however, who may not wholly agree with this teaching; nevertheless, it is the safest to follow. Consequently a lens of an anastigmatic form, as it is known, which gives sharp definition all over the field of the image, should be used. Some opticians make a specialty of calculating lenses especially for the work. Where money is no object, and it should not be in this matter of the lens, it is best to take advantage of this fact. The fallacy to be got rid of is, that any lens, provided it be of the necessary equivalent focus of from two to three inches, will answer for the purpose. It may visually produce what to the eye is a sharp picture, but when this comes to be critically examined on the screen the degradation of outline is obvious. There should be no obvious loss of structure in the enlarged picture on the screen. Moreover, it is well within the power of the moving picture operator to dispense with a very large aperture. His average rapidity of exposure is about a twentieth part of a second, which is no great speed in these days of highly sensitive films, well lighted studios and great power of artificial illumination, consequently he can use the smallest aperture in the lens which always has the effect of sharpening up the definition. A little hint may here be given as to the care of the lens. It must be scrupulously clean both on the outer and inner surfaces; no dust or other foreign particles being allowed to rest on them. Moisture should never be allowed to condense on it. Moisture and dust interfere with definition and degrade the quality of the image. Virtually the moving picture lens is a microscope and anybody familiar with microscopic work knows the extreme care with which the objective is always handled.

One of the most delicate operations of the work is that of focusing the image before exposing for the negative. The point to aim at is to get the perfection of sharp definition. There are three forms of focusing screens, ground glass, matted celluloid and plain glass. If the ground glass be coarse in structure, then it will be difficult to see the fine lines upon it without a magnifying glass. Some moving picture workers used matted celluloid, which gives a fine surface for the purpose, others, again, use plain optically plane glass. This, of course, does not give a very bright image, but with care it allows of the finer details to be seen. The thing to ensure is that on the focal plane, which is that position occupied by a strip of celluloid at the moment of exposure, there should be projected an absolutely sharp image of the subject in front of the camera. The point focused on is also of importance. Generally speaking, it should not be too far from the camera nor too near it. If a point somewhere in the middle be selected, then the necessary movements of the characters can take place without any fear of unsharpness and no part of the picture will be out of focus. This, however, is a matter of slight difficulty. If the camera be of fixed focus and the dimensions of the stage are known the lens may be made a constant factor in the work. In focusing the use of a magnifying eye piece will be found of assistance. Some moving picture photographers go the length of accurately measuring the focusing powers of the lens so that they can tell within 1,000th part of an inch whether it is in or out. The properties of a lens again vary in defining powers over planes situated at infinitesimally small distances from each other. This is an over refinement in practice which can be adopted and leads to excellent results. One manufacturer's films that are on the market show the great attention paid to them in this respect, therefore it will be seen that there is no waste of time or energy to use a lens on the moving picture camera as an instrument for accurately recording down to the smallest measurable dimensions all the detail in the subject that is placed before it to be photographed. The reader will, therefore, see from this brief glance that the necessary optical properties which a lens for moving picture work must possess is the extreme importance of obtaining an instrument which has been specially designed and constructed for the work. Just as there are special lenses for studio portraiture, out of door views, long distance subjects, enlarging, etc., and also each lens is the outcome of enormous scientific calculation and constructive skill, so also there are lenses especially made and used for moving picture negative making and projection. The advice given, therefore, to procure a lens so made cannot be too strongly insisted upon. Moreover, before it is put into actual work it should be carefully tested for its defining power, its covering properties, its evenness of illumination and its freedom from other defects the presence of which would impair the qualities of the picture.

The Wm. H. Swanson Company, Chicago, are open to buy any number of old Edison projecting machines (two-pin movement). Lowest price should be mentioned in first letter.

The C. J. Gorman's Amusement Company, of 120 Boylston street, Boston, Mass., with offices in the Knickerbocker Theater Building, New York, are prepared to install show houses and rent films and song slides. Mr. Gorman's long experience in the amusement field is a guarantee of his ability to give satisfaction in this line, and also in the furnishing of vaudeville talent, vocalists and piano players.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

[A series of articles by F. H. Richardson, Chicago, designed to be a complete compendium for the motion picture theater owner, manager and operator. This series will deal with everything connected with the motion picture business and will impart, in plain, understandable terms, information concering any and everything the motion picture theater man may wish to know. There will be instructions for figuring seating, lighting, selecting locations, installing new plants, decorative schemes, instructions for adjusting machines, hitching up to different lighting systems, descriptions of various resistance devices and how to couple them up, etc.

NOTE.—Manufacturers of small devices, such as patent dissolvers, etc., are invited to send samples to Mr. Richardson, 116 Chicago avenue, Chicago, for inspection and trial. Cuts should be sent also. An illustrated description will be given to all devices sent in. Articles sent for inspection will be returned if so requested.]

CHAPTER I.

It is imperative that the motion picture operator should thoroughly understand the electric current and the rules which govern its action under any given circumstance likely to be met with in the line of his work. It is not enough that he know that a few certain things will produce certain results. He should know WHY these results are obtained; in other words, he should understand the force he is handling, and understand it thoroughly if he expects to obtain the best possible results. Moreover, while the one who has not an elementary knowledge of electricity may learn to handle the current with very good results under one certain set of conditions, he is likely to be practically helpless under other and different conditions, particularly should he be called to "go on the road," thus being obliged to "hitch up" on different systems of wiring, different lighting systems, and meet with a wide range of voltage. Also the man who, while able to get fair, or even good, results under conditions with which he is familiar, does not thoroughly understand the force with which he is working is not in position to improve results already obtained through the medium of intelligent experiment. He must perforce depend almost wholly on what someone else tells him without being able to form an opinion as to whether what he has heard is likely to be correct or incorrect.

Good light is of prime importance in picture projection, and the one who is able to produce and maintain a clear, silvery-white spot has mastered three-fourths of the difficulties between him and the goal of good operating.

THE CURRENT—DIRECT AND ALTERNATING.

The difference between direct and alternating current is simple, once it is understood.

Direct current flows constantly in one direction, so that one carbon of the lamp is always positive and the other negative. For reasons which will be fully explained later, the positive carbon must always be above and the negative below when using direct current.

Alternating current, on the other hand, flows first in one direction and then in the other, this being caused by the peculiar construction of the generator (dynamo). The current flows one way for a time varying from 1-25 to 1-275 of a second. It then is reversed, flowing in the opposite direction for the same period of time. These two periods of flow are termed a "cycle." To make this term more clear: suppose you walk across a room, then turn and walk back again. When you got back where you started from you would have completed what would correspond to a "cycle" in alternating current. Therefore when you hear "60 cycle" current spoken of it means that the current reverses its direction 120 times per second. If it be 132 cycle the reversals are at the rate of 264 per second, etc. In a two-pole dynamo the current flows in one direction during the time the armature makes one-half of a revolution and in the opposite during the other half, so that one complete turn of the armature completes one "cycle." Modern dynamos, however, have more than two poles (some of them a great many more), thus reducing the necessary armature speed required to produce a given current frequency. ("Frequency" means the number of cycles per second.) All dynamos, direct or alternating, are constructed to produce a certain voltage, and the machine designed to produce, for instance, 110 volts could not and would not produce 220 volts or any other pressure than that named.

With alternating current each carbon of the lamp is alternately positive and negative. This has a very decided effect on projection light, as will be explained later on. Many operators claim that as good results cannot be obtained from alternating as with direct current, but this is not true, though it is somewhat more difficult and requires more current (amperes) to produce results equal to those possible with direct current.

Alternating current is preferred by power, and many lighting companies, mainly for the reason that it can be generated at high tension (voltage) transmitted to the place where it is to be used and there transformed (reduced to lower voltage) by means of a very simple arrangement, known as a transformer, the latter requiring very little care or attention. Also this current is just as readily transformed from a low to a high voltage.

This cannot be so readily done with direct current. For several reasons high tension direct current is neither so desirable or commercially practical as is alternating.

[NOTE.—Those who wish to learn more about this matter may do so by consulting works on electricity at their public library.]

Now the saving lies right here: high tension (high voltage) current capable of performing an immense amount of work can be transmitted over a very much smaller wire than can the same amount of electrical energy at low voltage. It is QUANTITY (amperes) of current flowing, not pressure, which determines the size of wire necessary. One (1) ampere at 2,000 volts becomes about ten (10) amperes after it has been transformed down to 110 volts pressure. By consulting the wire table (given later on) you will find that, while a very small wire will carry three amperes, it takes a much larger one to carry 30 amperes. Now suppose the current must be conducted one mile from the power station. If the tension is 2,000 volts the current may be brought right up to the transformer (usually located on the pole nearest to where the current is to be used) on a small wire, whereas if it were generated at 110 volts it must be carried all that distance at that voltage, thus requiring about ten times the amperage. Don't you see the immense saving in wiring cost?

All this has no direct bearing on operating or projection, but is explained for the reason that the writer has heard operators compelled to handle alternating current exclaim with considerable heat, "What do they generate the stuff for anyhow?" Then, too, the operator should have at least some understanding of these matters, and, as a matter-of-fact, the more general knowledge he has of electrical practice the better for him and his employer.

One question frequently asked the writer which seems to puzzle a great many operators who seek to understand alternating current is: "How is it that if the current reverses its direction so often there is flow sufficient to maintain an arc?"

This is very simple when one stops to consider the enormous speed of the electric current. This speed has been variously stated, some authorities placing it as high as that of light. With this in mind it will readily be seen that, infinitesimal as is the time required for an alternation the current will pass hundreds, if not thousands, of times entirely around a circuit many miles in length during that period. Electric speed is entirely beyond the power of the human mind to grasp and comprehend.

Careful experiment has proven that a low frequency current is most economical for power purposes, 25 to 30 cycle being best. On the other hand, the high frequency current is best for light. Current with as low frequency as above named will not do for light at all, as the illumination furnished by it is flickery and unsteady. It has been found that 60 cycle current answers fairly well for both purposes and that is the standard being adopted by practically all new commercial plants designed to furnish both light and power. Even the old plants originally furnishing very high or very low frequency current are changing their generators to 60 cycle machines, so that is the alternating current you will now most frequently meet with.

Direct current needs no detailed explanation. Being generated in the dynamo it flows out on one (the positive) wire, performs its work and returns to the dynamo via the other (negative) wire. You are not likely to have to cut into any high tension direct current systems and will almost invariably find direct current to be at a pressure of 110 volts, except where the three-wire system is used. From this sysetm (as will be explained further on) you can get either 110 or 220 volts, according to the way you "hitch up" to it.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

"Moral, Educational and Cleanly Amusing." Oh, do cut out the morality and education from your programme, gentlemen of the Patents Company. Positive morality and education are gotten in the churches and schools, which are the proper places for them. They have nothing to do with the moving picture theater. When I go to a baker's it is for bread, to a butcher's for meat, to a tailor's for cloth ,and so forth. I don't go for morality or education. Similarly, when I go to a moving picture theater it is for amusement. So it is with everybody else who is of sane mind and sound body.. If you want to make the moving picture theater a losing proposition why, then, turn it into a moral and educational shop; if you want to make it pay, stick to clean amusement.

Putting morality on one side, I know something about attempting to foist education off upon the patrons of a moving picture house. The experiment was tried. It might have been an educational and scientific success; it was not a financial one. I was instrumental in getting the exquisite micro-cinematographic work of a scientific friend shown nightly at a great popular place of amusement. Well, some of the audience appreciated it; others tolerated it, few understood it; some yawned over it; most were bored. The experiment was not continued as the box office told an unflattering tale: it didn't pay. It is axiomatic that if you preach to or lecture an audience in a place of amusement, your attendances will grow smaller by degrees and beautifully less.

But don't misunderstand me. There is magnificent scope for the moving picture as a moral and educational agency—but in the proper places. And these are the church, the school room, the lecture theater, the college class, the university. Before me as I write is a little book, entitled "The Cinematograph in Science, Education and Matters of State." It is by Charles Urban, F.Z.S., of London, and it is a most valuable treatise on the scientific applications of the moving picture. On the assumption that the Patents Company are really sincere in desiring to inculcate a love for the educational possibilities of the moving picture I will lend them my copy. Like to borrow it, Mr. Macdonald?

Mind, I'm not arguing for the graphic representation of the immoral or the intellectually futile. Nobody, I hope, will accuse me of that. But I emphatically object to the dull, the preachy, the stodgy. What do I like to see? What do I think most people like to see? What do I KNOW they like to see? Such subjects as these: The Biograph "Jones" series, the Pathe trick films, the Kalem Company's series, Selig's "In Old Arizona," the Vitagraph's Inauguration of President Taft, some of the Pathe comedies, the Messina earthquakes, and so on. Here we have farce, comedy, drama, topical, topography-humor, pathos, description, travel allied to good photography. All these are cleanly amusing, and there is an illimitable field of and for such subjects.

Again, the reader may say, "Well, Mister Lux Graphicus, continue your thusness and tell us what your ideal moving picture show is like. Where can we see these things all together?" I reply. Go to Lyman Howe's show whenever you can and as often as you can. He gives you cleanly amusing pictures of the highest class with wonderfully realistic effects, humor, beauty and something interestingly educational because it illustrates strange places, men and things. When Howe gets down to the dramatic and the comedy subjects he will show you the ne plus ultra of the work, I am certain. It needs such a master mind as Howe to bring before the public the enormous histrionic possibilities of the moving picture.

Let Howe make the experiment and then somebody will go and do what I've long been waiting for him to do, viz, build a first class Broadway theater specially for moving picture dramatic representations. What are Klaw & Erlanger, the Schuberts, and Keith & Proctor about that they do not go at the idea? I notice that on Central Park West a "New" Theater, which is, I think, to be devoted to the exploitation of ultra modern plays, is approaching completion. On such a programme it is probably foredoomed to financial failure. Won't somebody open it as a moving picture house showing the best work with luxurious surroundings and with orchestral accompaniments? If that, or something like it, were done, then we should be reaching the apotheosis of the moving picture, for "sassiety" would be doing its share in lifting into popular favor and it would become so respectabilized that the censorship would no longer be required, and the manufacturers would be fighting for the services of the best writers, producers and photographers in America. Which they are not now. No, they are not. "Moral, Educational and Cleanly Amusing." Amen!

OBSERVATIONS BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

During the past week there have been no jumps from the Patent Company fold. Towards the close of March many ugly rumors were afloat. It was stated that by the second week of April the film renters holding licenses under the company would not have enough customers on their lists to make up a rent-paying revenue. This has not developed. Inquiry among the Patents Company renters warrants the statement that the situation with them is about as it stood a week ago, and if there has been any change it was of a slighly favorable character. The true situation is that conditions in the ranks of these renters are gradually assuming normal shape and the much-talked-of revolution among the exhibitors against the payment of the license fee exacted by the Patents Company has been practically abandoned. I understand that this has been accomplished by two methods on the part of the licensed renters. Either the renter pays the fee to the Patents Company and adds two dollars per week to the rental price for films, or the renter pays the fee unconditionally to hold the customer. The latter policy is a losing game for the renters. For instance: An exchange of this city took on a customer at the beginning of the month and paid the full fee for him. The customer became dissatisfied with the service and went to another renter at the expiration of the first week. The customer having a license good for at least three weeks more was entitled to service from any licensed exchange he might apply to. The last I heard of the matter, film renter number one was wrangling with number two to get a rebate on the fee paid, and number two was holding up the argument that all the interest he had in the matter was to make sure before serving the customer that he had a license, regardless of who paid for it. I have not seen the exhibitor in the case, but a friend of his remarked: "Vell, vot of it? Yas, they took a chance and furnished the license. They couldn't give him the service he wanted, so they lost the chance."

I have been asked several times during the past few days as to which faction had made the most gains during that period—the licensed renters, or the independents. I really do not think there has been a distinctive gain on either side. Inquiries among the manufacturers working under the Patents Company agreement show that the expected slump to the independents on account of the second levy of a license fee to cover the period to May 1 did not take place and nearly all renters who took the precaution to file fourteen-day notices of withdrawal of their orders have cancelled the notices. This is an indication that these renters are holding their customers and the expected exodus to the independents did not take place. One thing is certain, however, the manufacturers forming the Patents Company are not putting out as many films now as they did this time last year. An explanation given of this is that the immense production of the past year overstocked the renters and they are making the best use of the subjects on hand at the best prices obtainable, purchasing new subjects only to supply first run customers who are willing to pay the price. I guess this is pretty near right, too.

The present is a poor time upon which to base calculations as to the advantage of either faction. The holy season is here and the Passion Play and like biblical subjects are now in great demand. Some say that this accounts for the quietness that prevails. The exhibitors know that the manufacturers identified with the combination have an ample supply of such subjects and they want the use of them. After the holy season passes over and any subject will go again, it is said, the exhibitors will show a more independent spirit. I don't quite concur in this view. I candidly believe that the exhibitors are inclined to let matters drift on the present tide until other affairs assume a more favorable and definite shape. They are more concerned with the Sunday proposition than any other. All eyes are turned upon the Legislature and also upon Justice Gaynor, of the Supreme Court of Brooklyn. The latter has before him the constitutionality of Mayor McClellan ruling that the moving picture exhibitions cannot be given on Sundays. If Justice Gaynor decides that the Mayor is right and the Legislature fails to legalize Sunday exhibitions, I look for a slump in the film rental business. Many predict that in such an event the moving picture business will be killed. This seems a little far-fetched. For a time there will be a big drop in the weekly receipts, but the business now done on Sundays will no doubt be gradually distributed and the week's end showing will eventually be about the same. But I still adhere to what I said last week to the effect that the Sunday question is not going to sting the exhibitors as badly as many of them anticipate. I attach more importance to local conditions and prospects than to the doings in Albany.

A correspondent asks me if I maintain that peace prevails in the Patents field and all is harmony and contentment among the licensed manufacturers and renters. I will be honest with him and say that I do not. From reliable information received from various sources it is very evident that dissatisfaction prevails. Many complaints are made of unreasonableness, mistakes and a failure to be in touch with real conditions, but there have been no desertions so far this month. At least I have heard of none. Swanson and the Twentieth Century Optiscope Company were the last to fold their tents and go to the other side. All the rest appear to be sticking it out with determination. Their fidelity is due in a great measure to assurances given by the Patents Company that if allowed time to systematize its operations it will eventually adjust all affairs to the entire satisfaction of all concerned. There is no denying that the Patents people have made some blunders to the detriment of the film renters. Instances have been brought to my notice where films have been replevined from exhibitors who had paid their license fees. Of course all must admit that such cases were not deliberate, but due purely to a failure to properly note and keep track of those who had paid their fees. Nevertheless it has caused better feeling in many quarters and explanations have had but little effect. Instances of the kind I mention have been the chief causes of discontent.

I notice that the film manufacturers of England, including those who refused to join, or who deserted from the ranks of the combination that was formed several weeks ago, have issued a plea in behalf of true art and the discouragement of undesirable enterprises. Film manufacturers are springing up in all quarters and their products, it is claimed, are injuring the regulars through inferior quality and general workmanship. The same cry will be raised in this country before long. OLIVER.

THE LECTURES.

The week's lectures have been quite as good as usual, with one that stands out as beyond the ordinary. A young man is telling the story of a bicycle trip through southern California, at the Keith & Proctor theater on Fourteenth street, and it is good. He tells his story in a homely way that pleases the audience, and his information is of the kind that pleases because of the little touches that interest the average person.

The lectures can be made a more important part of the programs than they are now. It would seem as though the selection of subjects dealing with life nearer home would be even more interesting than what is being offered. The fact that there is a wealth of material close at hand unused seems to point to an unusually fertile field for the man who first introduces this scheme.

THE CENSORS GAZE ON 25,000 FEET OF FILM.

On Tuesday the Board of Censorship met in the offices of Pathe Freres and, with the exception of one hour for luncheon, sat all day in a darkened room and inspected over 25,000 feet of film. From an interview with Mr. Goldenberg, the New York sales manager for Pathe Freres, we learn that not one of the subjects shown was rejected and but a few minor changes were suggested and sections cut out which the firm readily agreed with. The Pathe firm is therefore in possession of a month's advance supply of censored subjects.

A NEW THEATER FOR CHICKASHA, OKLA.

Ed. Hatten and H. R. Hovey have leased lots on Chickasha avenue and will erect a new Summer theater there. The building will be 40 x 140; the stage 25 x 30, and will have four dressing rooms size 6 x 8; seating capacity, 700. Prices 10 and 20 cents. Three shows daily, matinee and two night shows, consisting of four vaudevile acts and two reels of pictures and the illustrated song. The lobby will be fitted up in the latest style and the house will be one of the best in the State, as no effort or expense will be spared to make this theater first-class in every particular. Opening April 15, 1909.

W. H. SWANSON ON THE SITUATION.

A Moving Picture World representative made several calls in the past ten days for the purpose of securing an interview with Mr. Swanson, but each time found him unquestionably the busiest man in Chicago, but was finally successful in gaining a little of his valuable time.

The first question asked Mr. Swanson was, "What is new in the situation?"

"My dear sir, the situation is all new. Especially the experience of actually having to refuse customers in the film renting business. It seems almost beyond belief," he replied. "No better ideas as to the feelings of the generality of exhibitors could be obtained under any circumstances or in any place to better advantage than by looking around our busy office. It seems like the old days two years ago, at which time it was not an uncommon thing to actually refuse to take on a customer at a great deal higher price for a lesser number of reels than we are furnishing to-day. At the present moment I feel greatly indebted to the Trust for the prosperity being enjoyed in my various offices. This same fact is no doubt prevailing in all Independent offices catering to a high standard of business. In the past two weeks a great number of film exchange men affiliated with the Trust have visited me and none of them seemed at all enthusiastic over their position and the volume of business being done. In fact, representatives of the largest film exchanges in the country, some of whom have honored me with a visit, have stated that they have lost great sums of money. I have every reason to believe this to be a fact, for the simple reason that in the vast majority of cases exchanges handling Trust film are not competing or fighting with the Independents, as that is entirely out of the question for the reasons which I will explain later. Their competition is among themselves. They are cutting and slashing each other with prices in a frantic desire to accumulate a great number of accounts rather than making any concentrated effort to secure a lucrative business. This mad scramble on their part for business, which the great majority of them secure only on the price cutting basis, as so very few of them realize the importance of impressing exhibitors with quality rather than quantity and have absolutely lost sight of the fact that they should rather impress an exhibitor with the fact that it is better for him to pay an increased price for his service and in that way encourage the film exchange to better his service, which is the only possible way in which it can be done, and unless an exchange man receives an adequate remuneration from his customers it is obviously impossible for him to buy film. Added to the demoralizing effect of cutting prices, one against the other, it is a positive fact that at least 80 per cent. of the $2.00 a week royalty hold-up paid to the Trust is being paid by the exchange men and not by the exhibitors. How long they will be able to carry this handicap is beyond conjecture.

"What a different phase the matter has with the Independents. A few weeks ago, while connected with the Trust, $35.00 a week for a daily change of film right out of the can was considered a fairly good price in Chicago. I am most happy to say that the price being paid for Independent service of the same grade would make that price appear like commercial ruin. That is why I stated above that the Trust exchanges are not in competition with the Independents. The Independent service being practically an exclusive one, wide-awake exhibitors have not been slow to take advantage of it and it has been thoroughly demonstrated to me that price is no object. Getting down to figures —I will take the office of a Trust film exchange. We will say that the exchange man has a weekly business of $2,000. In order to handle that amount of business it will be necessary to buy at least twelve reels of film a week; also to maintain a large establishment and a considerable force of help. The cost of operating an office and handling that volume of business, including rent, light, salaries, insurance, advertising, solicitors, postage and express charges, etc., would be not less that five hundred dollars per week. This added to the twelve hundred dollars paid for film, totals seventeen hundred dollars, leaving a balance of three hundred dollars. It will require not less than one hundred customers at an average of twenty dollars each to make up two thousand dollars. One hundred customers at the two dollar a week royalty means two hundred dollars a week more added to the seventeen hundred paid out, which makes nineteen hundred dollars. This leaves the magnificent amount of one hundred dollars from which the owner of the exchange must find his own salary, interest on his investment, bad debts, legal fees for making collections, unpaid damage on film and various other matters too numerous to mention. His finish is described in 'The writing on the wall.'

"This is bringing us to a danger point which I have just come to a realization of. That is, in the course of a short time there will be quite a number of exchanges who through the requirements of the Trust of their buying twenty-five hundred dollars' worth of film per month, added to the warm weather season just coming on will undoubtedly knock off a considerable amount of their business and compel them to withdraw from the Trust. The material loss of business on the part of the manufacturers affiliated with the Trust will bring about the necessity of combining their interests and entering the film renting field on their own hook. This, in turn, will drive many more of the exchanges to operate with the Independents and will have the effect of creating a vast amount of competition among the Independents, all of which will have a most demoralizing effect on the business in general and instead of bettering conditions as the Trust has prognosticated would be the effect of their combination for the control of prices it will act as a boomerang instead. Without question of doubt there will always be two factions in the moving picture field, and the sooner both sides realize this fact and settle down to sane business-like methods of securing business and eliminate the desire for a volume of business at the expense of a profitable one, the happier the result will be for all concerned.

"The last two issues of your paper have been read by me with much pleasure. I am now referring to the articles which you published stating that the battle is now one of quality and where you have come out flat-footed and stated that the American manufacturer is not the equal of his European competitor. This statement on your part substantiates the statement I have been making for the past several weeks—in fact, since the first release day of Independent film. Personally, I do not consider any Trust film exchange a competitor. The quality of the film furnished by the Trust in no way compares with that being supplied by the Independents, and I can readily see where the Trust requires a prohibitive tariff on film for the reason that the European performer does not receive nearly the salary, although they are more accomplished, that the American performer receives in the making of moving pictures, and in order to equalize the difference it is well for the American production that the tariff exists. The European productions all indicate high-class artists in their branch of the business. There is no lack of detail in their productions, especially when they confine themselves to pictures of countries with whose customs they are familiar. It is not likely that you will find a European picture describing a battle scene which was supposed to have taken place in Europe in which a woman might be found searching the field for a wounded relative, wearing high heeled shoes, a long boa, a monstrous muff and productions of this year's fashions, especially as the scene was laid in the early Summer. Neither would you find in a European production anything quite so ridiculous as was displayed in a recent Edison picture showing an Eskimo killing a white man in the far north and being arrested by a Broadway policeman and the actors busily shifting about in a climate of forty below zero without protection on their hands. There are many points of difference to be remarked on, but it would take more of your valuable space than you would be willing to allow to make comparisons.

"I am glad to say that the feeling which the average exhibitor has had for the past few weeks that the Independents could not hold up with a satisfactory supply for any length of time is very rapidly disappearing. Without doubt, the Independents can secure more and better film than that furnished by the Trust, and the statements of a subsidized pamphlet representing the interests of a couple of Trust manufacturers in a recent issue that there was a great quantity of Independent film was brought to Chicago a short time ago and that the greater quantitiy of it was not passed by the police censors here, in endeavoring to show that it was the representative release, was a misstatement of facts and to say the least was without regard for truth or veracity. The facts that did exist were that three certain film exchanges in Chicago have combined their interests and have a representative in Europe picking up cheap second hand film, and it was this shipment that this 'rag' referred to. It strikes me that the sooner the trade journals recognize the fact that there will always be two factions in the moving picture business and that the absolute truth is much more advantageous than misrepresentations, the better the result will be for all concerned.

"I also read with much amusement the comments published in this same so-called 'journal,' regarding my status with the Trust. It, indeed, was ridiculous, in making statements that I was such a flagrant violator, etc., of their rules. I must, indeed, have been a flagrant violator of agreements when you stop to consider that by living up to their schedule as established only a year ago and neglecting my business in the furtherance of the interests of the Film Service Association, my film rentals dropped from thirteen thousand dollars per week to less than fourteen hundred dollars per week and that my film purchases dropped from thirty-five thousand dollars per month to twenty-four hundred dollars per month. This was brought about by living up to the rules and regulations and accepting restrictions instead of resorting to the underhand methods of many of the film exchanges being operated by those of the same race as the young intellectual giant who is acting the parrot in the conduction of his so-called 'trade paper,' and who would probably make a greater success peddling shoe strings and collar buttons. He very much reminds me of the saying that a dog that will bite the hand that has fed him must indeed be an ungrateful cur. I have been informed by several visitors from the East that the Patents Company is considered around the city of New York as pretty much of a joke. The Western fellows have not yet had their sense of humor aroused to that point, caused probably by the fact that they are so far from the 'home plate.' I fail to comprehend why they have not yet awakened to a realization that the 'hot air' promises extended to both exchanges and exhibitors have not in a single instance been carried out. Where has the improvement been to the exhibitor—to the exchange man—or to the public? I fail to find one single threat carried out! One single promise fulfilled! Had the Trust any desire to eliminate the unreliable or undesirable film exchanges the wonderfully capable General Manager of the Octopus had all the necessary information at first hand as to who was and who was not interested in the uplift of the business and has sworn affidavits enough to fill a suit case. What undesirable theaters have been closed? What exchanges have had their film taken from them? What exchange had paid what they owed them when they cut them off? Why do they not get busy? Is it the fear of getting into court and are they afraid to test the recent Supreme Court decision that it is not necessary to pay indebtedness to a Trust? The surprising feature of the whole transaction is the guilelessness of the average exhibitor in taking for granted that he was to receive all these benefits, without question, and some of them are still so foolish as to pay the two dollars royalty for the privilege of operating their own machines.

"In conclusion, I will say that I have just to-day learned that the president of this M. P. P. Co. is to be in Chicago Wednesday. It is reported that he is coming on to convince the two local manufacturers that unless they are desirous of personally standing the legal expense of further opposing the operation of the Melies factory here they intend to license it. Probably while here he will also decide that he wants to start a little trouble, and I most sincerely hope he will not find his time so valuable that he cannot devote a portion of it to enforcing some of their so-called 'legal rights,' as there are some few of us here who are more than willing, ready and anxious to find out how far he will go. However, we have few hopes of the Trust desiring to air their grievances before a panel of American jurors."

Chicago, Ill.—The Stock Theater Managers' Association has been incorporated, with a capital stock of $1,000, for the purpose of operating theaters. The incorporators are Edward Thankhauser, J. V. Howell and Charles S. Martin.

The Association of Moving Picture Shows is the title of an organization that is being promoted in Rochester, N. Y., to look after the interests of exhibitors in that city and surrounding territory. The following temporary officers were elected: President, George Simpson; vice-president, Harry Wick; secretary and treasurer, R. M. Mock. A fund of $200 was subscribed to meet current expenses.

The Majestic Theater, of Belvidere, Ill., is run on progressive lines. A seven-inch double-column ad. in the local daily paper sets forth an attractive program of two reels, two songs and a five-piece orchestra. The same newspaper takes up a half column to describe the attractions and comment on the decorations of the theater, which were executed by high-class artists and architects, and it is said to compare favorably with any show house in the State of Illinois. The advertising in the local paper is a point worthy of imitation by other moving picture houses, and also the style of program of the Majestic, which, by the way, is on the high road to success.

NEW PATHE MACHINE.

Pathe Freres, 41 West Twenty-fifth street, New York, have just issued a handsome catalogue describing their new projecting machine, which they will be pleased to mail to any exhibitor desirous of procuring a high-class outfit.

WEEKLY COMMENTS ON THE SHOWS.

By Our Own Critic.

Last Sunday, as usual, I went to church in the morning and said my prayers, and then in the afternoon, without doing the smallest violence to my conscience, I went to a moving picture theater, to wit, the one situated at 168 West Twenty-third street, New York City. As chance would have it, the pretty little hall was almost filled with children. They sat next to me and around me, some had their parents or older friends with them, and here and there throughout the hall were other "children of a larger growth," like myself, who had turned in for a few minutes' inspection of a Sunday afternoon entertainment, which has recently been so severely denounced in the pulpits of the United States.

Where was the unseemliness, immorality, depravity, disorderliness that has been so much complained of in these shows? Not at West Twenty-third street last Sunday afternoon. Everything was as well conducted as Canon Chase's church could have been. If Sunday picture shows are carried on in a manner no worse than this, for Heaven's sake, Mr. Mayor and Mr. Alderman, let them alone. They do no harm. They do much good; they provide people with healthy amusement which need not interfere with their religious duties. They did not with mine; so why should they with anybody else's?

The subject shown at West Twenty-third street included the "Fake Doctor," of Pathe; "The Inn Keeper's Remorse," of the same firm; "The Voice of the Violin," by the Biograph Company; "Uncongenial Partners," by Vitagraph, and pictures of life in the French navy, by Pathe. Here we had humor, drama, comedy, and, in the case of "Uncongenial Partners," the pleasure of the human voice. At this little theater they call it as elsewhere, the Humaniscope. Living persons behind the screen talk in unison with the actions of the pictures on the screen. "Uncongenial Partners" is the story of a man and a woman, each tired of the other, advertising for "good time" companions. Of course they each answer the other's advertisement, and it all ends by husband and wife being happily re-united. Gentlemen of the Vitagraph Company, I wrote a story on this theme more years ago than I care to count. Give us something new, or pay a good price for fresh matter, please. But this act went splendidly. So did the Biograph picture, "The Voice of the Violin"; a new subject to me. It is, briefly, the story of a teacher of the violin falling in love with a pretty girl, whose father objects to the marriage. Then the disappointed violinist is inveigled into anarchical circles and draws the fatal lot which binds him to assist in the explosion of the bomb under the house in which the girl and father live. Though pinioned by an accomplice, the violin teacher manages to prevent the explosion doing injury, and in reward for his bravery is finally given the hand of the pretty girl. She IS a pretty girl, too. I fell very much in love with her last Sunday afternoon. Whenever there is a Biograph picture to be shown wherein this charming girl figures, I am there with my money to gaze upon her in silent, if unrequited, admiration. But about the picture: I would like to compliment the producers on its fine dramatic quality, and the clearness with which the cogent and well-knit story is told. The acting, too, is splendid, and from the purely comedy or dramatic standpoint I do not think anything better could be desired by this or any other audience. Certainly this film and the Humaniscope were the best appreciated items in an entertainment with which absolutely no fault could be found. And all for a nickel, gents!

I was much impressed by the extreme care taken by the ushers to keep order in the hall and their solicitude for the children present. A man was leaving the hall with a child, two others remaining behind. The man, however, was told by the usher that the two children he proposed to leave behind must go out with him. I presume this is in accordance with official regulations. Then I like the system in vogue here in giving anyone, who, like myself on this occasion, strikes the show midway, a ticket, entitling him to go through the entire performance. Again, I like the courtesy of the attendant who readily found me a seat when I was standing. They do not do this everywhere. These are some of the many excellent features about this little theater which deserve to be mentioned. If all the Nickelodeons were as well conducted on Sundays as this one appears to be, then Canon Chase and his friends would find their occupation gone.

BROTHERS, WHERE ARE WE DRIFTING TO?

From a Disgusted Exhibitor.

Some three months ago the Film Service Association disbanded and a new fight, a more bitter fight, started between the manufacturers. We, the poor exhibitors, who are doing everything to please the public and to promote the industry, were not considered, but left at the mercy of the sharks. We waited to see which way the cat would jump. The Trust came to us with alluring promises, that if we would agree to pay a license of $2 per week the licensed manufacturers would give us the very best pictures and the Trust would guarantee us protection. On another hand, the Independents told us to wait, to not sign away our rights, that they would offer us a far better service, give us better pictures, etc.

Both camps made great promises and both camps have kept NONE.

The Independents are very slow in bringing out new pictures. It seems to me that they sold the skin of the bear before killing the beast. In other words, they believed that it would be an easy thing to go to Europe to look for new manufacturers. But did they find film suitable to the American market? According to their circulars, they have found some 27 foreign manufacturers, but they cannot amount to much, as we do not see much good work from them. The Independents promised us that they would start at once some American factories with the best talent and would be able to supply us with the very best productions.

Although these promises were alluring, we could not ignore the orders of the Trust, as by refusing to pay the $2 license our places would have been closed.

Same as many other exhibitors, I paid the $2 license to save my place while waiting to see the developments.

Brothers, where are we drifting to?

What have we received for our $2 license? Have we received better pictures? No. The films issued this year are not above the average of last year. Some are not only inferior in quality but show great carelessness on the part of the manufacturer. The licensed manufacturers seem to say that, now they have us in their power they can give us any old thing. What protection have we received? None. We have for competitors a lot of unscrupulous and greedy exhibitors, who do not care for moving pictures, their only ambition being to fill their houses to-day, to grab all the nickels in sight. They do not care for the future, they say that to-morrow will take care of itself. Many of them were formerly pedlers, hucksters, etc.; they have no principles, and if the moving pictures are ruined they will return to their vocation of selling shoe strings or vegetables. With this greed of nickels, they stop at nothing, they fill their programmes with low vaudeville acts, give away souvenirs, etc.—anything to draw the crowd.

Are the manufacturers, who have so many millions invested in the industry, ready to go on the road also as pedlers if the moving picture business is ruined? It should be the duty of the M. P. P. Co., after collecting so many thousands of dollars in $2 licenses, to look after this question, to fight the vaudeville, and if not for the sake of the exhibitors, at least for the sake of the manufacturers. With our $2 the Trust has been able to fit up luxurious offices for an army of clerks. What will all these clerks do if the moving pictures are ruined by vaudeville?

We are surely entitled to some protection, but as we have found that the Trust is very indifferent for the welfare of the exhibitors, we ask them to at least consider the manufacturers, the numerous employees of the factories, etc. We do not care for all these long circulars from the Trust. In common parlance, they are "hot air." What we want is protection for our money.

Are the Independents doing better? No. They are very slow; they have few good films to show us. Out of four factories to be started by the Independents, we hear that the one in Chicago is not completed. The one out West is completed and is equipped with everything "foreign." The American talent has not been recognized, and, according to promises, they are going to send us some wonderful films. Let us hope so, but if the Western productions are as much "hot air" as the Eastern productions, then we cannot expect much. The two Eastern factories have already placed some films on the market—films that show haste and inexperience, but give promise of better things.

The Independents promised us some better manufacturers than the Pathe Freres, Gaumont, Urban Eclipse, now with the Trust, and they started American factories to beat the Edison, Selig, Biograph, etc., and they have so far failed in their promises.

Both the Trust and the Independents have failed in their promises.

Brothers, where are we drifting to?

Must we stick to the Trust, keep paying them the license, and see our money wasted on offices, clerks, circulars and postage for nothing?

Must we turn to the Independents and lose our patronage by showing poor pictures?

If the Trust would give us enough good pictures we could resist the vaudeville, as we can find enough persons desirous of seeing high class pictures to keep us alive, but we cannot keep our places going when the Trust shows us a stone church in an Esquimaux village, a false representation of the telephone service, the work of the guillotine, etc.

When we found that we could not expect anything for our license fees, we waited patiently to see what the Independents would do. We waited in vain, the supply was slow and outside of a very few good films, we did not consider the service good enough to make a change. We again waited, hoping that the new factories of the Independents would save the situation. We do not want to discourage them too much, but we do not see anything in these new productions.

We had an idea that if the Independents had been able to get some real good foreign films and had been able to produce something good themselves, that they would have stimulated the licensed manufacturers. But with the showing of the Independents, the Trust folks are laughing in their sleeves. They know they hold us by the nose and all that we can do is to accept their terms, pay them the license fees, and take any old thing they are willing to give us in the line of films.

Brothers, where are we drifting to?

AN EXHIBITOR.

FROM A CHICAGO EXHIBITOR.

The following extract from a long letter from a Chicago exhibitor shows that the Licensed manufacturers have some supporters in that center of Independent action.

It seems to the writer that the past few months have worked wonders for the motion picture business as a whole. While it is to be admitted that there is a very large, life-sized possibility that the complete maturation of the Motion Picture Patents Company would place them in a position to be the absolute dictator of all branches of the business and work much injustice and hardship on individuals or individual concerns, still, on the other hand, the observant, unbiased, unprejudiced onlooker is bound to conclude that there are flagrant abuses which have grown up with the business which can be only obliterated by some force powerful enough to control absolutely the motion picture business as a whole.

It is an unquestionable fact that the public is being outraged daily by the exposition of "rainstorms" which should have been retired months, if not years, ago. It is an unquestionable fact that there are thousands of small, ill-ventilated, dirty "dumps," called by courtesy motion picture theaters, which ought, for the good of the business as a whole, to be eliminated. It is an unquestionable fact that there is a superabundance of unfair competition. By "unfair" I mean this: A showman puts up a really good five cent house in a good locality. He knows his business and invests his experiences and his money and, of course, does well. Someone who knows nothing at all about the show business notes that he is making money; promptly assuming that he can, of course, do the same, he therefore promptly proceeds to install another house, fully believing that all he has to do is equip a room, get a machine, hire a cheap man to twist the crank, and, Presto! he will have just as good a show as anyone else. He probably hires a manager for a couple of weeks, by which time our novice knows all there is to know about the show business, of course, and the "manager" is fired; another full-fledged showman has been born, evolved or created.

Naturally, his show is not up to the mark, if it is not utterly rotten. But he hurts the good show, all the same, and gives the business, as a whole, a black eye. Moreover, he may discover the fact that if the other fellow is running a good, clean show and getting the better class of people, he can fill his house by pandering to the vicious, by running racy pictures and vaudeville and by catering to the desire of Young America to witness robberies and murders galore.

Without going further into this matter (you all know the critter I am talking about, I guess), if the Motion Picture Patents Company can successfully eliminate this class of competition it will have by that one act done much to justify its own existence. If it can also eliminate, or even reduce, the use of "junk" film and put a lot of one-horse "film exchanges" out of business, it will have accomplished wonders.

As to the dangers arising from bringing into existence so powerful a force, they are very real, I fear. Still, the business as a whole cannot possibly be injured without at the same time injuring the business of the manufacturers who themselves form the Motion Picture Patents Company. It does not stand to reason that film makers are going deliberately to work to injure themselves, does it? I think not; so we may assume that, barring mistakes, whatever is done by the Moving Picture Patents Company will only be done, after careful consideration, for the good of the business as a whole.

The writer, therefore, is unable to work up for himself a respectable scare over the formation of this company and is compelled to conclude that it will be, in the end, for the best interests of the legitimate exhibitor and for the business as a whole.

A SHOWMAN.

A WORD TO THE MANAGERS.

By an Cperator.

There are few managers of moving picture theaters who give much thought to the operator, although on him depends the success of their business.

"The man in the box," he is generally called, and because he is confined in this box it may be that his health is being endangered. The operator should have more consideration. If the piano player should happen to leave in the middle of the show you can do without him for the time being; as long as "the man in the box" is with you the show will go on just the same. If the trap drummer or the singer should leave you suddenly, "the man in the box" can still enable you to pile up the nickels in the box office.

The other theater attaches generally get an hour for meals, but "the man in the box" is too valuable to be dispensed with for so long a time. In asking for more consideration for the operator, I do not necessarily mean that he should get more pay than he may be getting in some cases, but two operators should be employed in theaters where the run is practically 12 hours a day. I could name several theaters that are noted for the high quality of their shows that employ two operators. Smaller places may not be able to afford this, but they could employ a second licensed operator as usher, who would be on hand to take up a regular shift or relieve the strain on the regular operator.

This is one of the matters that should be taken up in the regulations that the Motion Picture Patents Company are enforcing in their licensed theaters.

W. M. S

THE VITAGRAPH NAPOLEON.

The Napoleonic legend will probably last for all time. There is an undying fascination about the character of the "Little Corsican," who, by sheer force of will, got his heel on the neck of Europe 100 years ago. He was by turns a great military commander, statesman, ruler, legislator, and withal, a thoroughly immoral man. Indeed, his reputation in the latter regard, however much historians may whitewash it, will always be ineffaceably black.

Such a character as this is bound to excite the imagination of students of history. It has formed the theme of innumerable plays, for the story of the man is so intensely human and dramatic that even a moving picture playwright can make use of it, and it is indeed a poor actor who cannot get something out of the character of Napoleon across the footlights. It was, therefore, inevitable that the story of Napoleon should be made the subject of a silent play, and the Vitagraph Company in tackling it have shown both enterprise and wisdom. Moreover, they have displayed much praiseworthy acumen in looking up authorities on the spot and getting accuracy of costumes and other theatrical data necessary for the correct mounting of the piece. The first half of the play, for it is in two sections, has been shown during this week, and we have observed that it has been received with great favor wherever it has been exhibited in New York City.

The story deals with Napoleon's relations with the Creole woman, Josephine Beauharnais, whom he makes his empress and divorces on the ground of her inability to bear him a son. A pathetic story in all conscience! It is told in a series of beautiful stage pictures, well mounted, well dressed, well rehearsed and exceedingly well acted. Indeed, in this latter respect, we have hardly seen better acting in a moving picture play. The memory lingers hauntingly over two scenes, that in which Napoleon, from the steps of his throne, tells the empress why he must deprive her of her crown, and next where the divorce is officially pronounced. Here the actor and actress who impersonate Napoleon and his wife seemed to feel the parts they were playing and to convey their emotions to the audience, who watched the drama with breathless interest. Josephine's anguish when she is to sign the divorce papers, and Napoleon's gloomy determination to follow the star of his destiny were magnificently suggested. Indeed the acting in this scene, especially the final touch where the woman takes off her crown and places it at the feet of the emperor, were good enough to make the fortune of any Napoleonic stage play. Other affecting scenes exceedingly well rendered were the parting of Josephine and Napoleon, and Josephine's lonely and reminiscent life at Malmaison. The story is so clearly and well told; everybody of the smallest pretension to education is so familiar with the trouble of Napoleon and Josephine, that we predict great popularity for this fine piece of moving picture work, which is also a splendid bit of photography from the Vitagraph studio. This is the first of the Vitagraph art productions; if those that are to follow it are up to it in quality, then the renaissance of the American moving picture is assured.

MOVING PICTURES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

The following is an extract from a letter sent to us from a valued correspondent and old friend, Arthur V. Kenah, A. C. A., a well-known photographic scientist and chartered accountant, of Victoria, B. C.:

"Out here the people seem to be very fond of moving pictures, and there are a considerable number of ten-cent houses devoted to that form of amusement, and they all seem to be pretty well patronized. The latest one is the Majestic, which had the nasty experience of a fire on the night of its opening, March 19, but fortunately everyone got out inside of three minutes, but sufficient damage was done to the apparatus to put it out of commission for three or four days. I have not been there myself, but it looks to be a nice place and is situated right in the middle of the principal thoroughfare, viz., Hastings street. There is also one of those Cameraphone places here, and I can speak from experience as to the excellence of this show, which greatly surprised me. In Victoria there are two moving picture shows, the Empress, on Government street, and the Victoria Theater, which goes in for this line of business in the Winter when it is not engaged with a regular dramatic performance. I have been to the theater when there wasn't a seat to be had anywhere in the house, so you will see that it is a popular amusement in that city."

TRANSFORMER FOR MOVING PICTURE ARC LAMPS.

The problem of supplying low voltage alternating current to moving picture arc lamps from commercial supply circuits has several solutions. These involve either the use of a rheostat or a choke coil in series with the arc, a compensator or auto transformer connected across the line with low voltage taps or a transformer with a low voltage secondary.

It is a vell known fact that there is a very large waste of energy in a series rheostat, depending, of course, upon the voltage of the supply circuit. Many lighting companies require the use of 220 volts for moving picture work in order to avoid heavily loading one side of a three-wire system. This increases the losses considerably in circuits where a resistance or a reactive device is used for reducing the voltage.

The use of a rheostat also involves a greater fire risk due to excessive heating; it also increases the discomfort and danger to the operator.

Another disadvantage is the effect produced on the voltage regulation of the lighting circuit when the lamp is switched on or off.

Reducing voltage by the use of a choke coil or an autotransformer is undesirable on account of the introduction of reactance into the circuit, resulting in a large current at a low power factor being taken from the system, thereby seriously affecting the voltage of the lighting circuit. This scheme is also open to the objection that the operator may receive unpleasant shocks when the circuit is suddenly opened or closed.

In order to meet the demand for a device that would be free from all these objectionable features, the General Electric Company has recently placed on the market a special transformer for moving picture work. This transformer, known as the "Economy-Arc," has a low voltage secondary winding with three taps giving 30, 40 or 50 amperes in the arc circuit. This method of regulating the current is a valuable feature of the "Economy-Arc" and adapts it to a number of varying conditions such as result from different densities of films and different distances between lamp and screen. The fact that with this device there is no direct electrical connection between the lamp and the supply circuit is also important.

The transformer is so designed that with the secondary on short circuit the primary current will not rise to an excessively high value. The temperature rise being low the "Economy-Arc" is very cool-running and its introduction to the circuit increases the reactance but little. Low operating temperature means much to the lamp operator who has very little room for his apparatus and must necessarily be in close proximity to the regulating device.

The dimensions of the entire device, which includes the transformer and regulating switch and connections, are as follows: Height over switch handle, 16 inches; floor space, 13 x 16¼ inches. The weight is approximately 85 pounds.

The construction is very substantial and embodies all of the distinctive features of transformers as manufactured by the General Electric Company.

THE McKINNEY CAMERA AND PROJECTOR.

According to a statement issued by J. W. McKinney, vice-president of the International Projecting and Producing Company, his non-infringing camera will shortly be ready for the market. Mr. McKinney says:

"We have been working day and night since our first announcement was made. Our machinery is now installed and the jigs are perfected, all of which has required a tremendous amount of energy and time. The building of a successful moving picture machine requires the finest workmanship of anything mechanical except a watch, and you have my word for it that our machine will be much finer than many watches. Jigs which measure to the one-thousandth part of an inch are but an incident. I have added new features to this machine which have required the changing of many of the patterns. The special machinery required could not be made in a minute, particularly since we will have nothing but the best, in fact, genuine masterpieces of the machinist's art. Our factory machinery will be electrically driven and each machine is to have a saparate motor, thus eliminating any shafting and over-head belting, making less dirt and making each man master of his machine. Our factory will soon be in running order and the public will be invited to inspect it."

THE SONGS.

Some good songs have been offered during the week, all fairly well sung, but it must be admitted that in not all instances have the illustrations been as good as they should have been. Some unnamed slides are being used and they cannot be commended. The slides from the makers who use their names are beyond criticism, but the daubs which have been used in illustrating some of the songs were without the name of the manufacturer and were unworthy of use.

It would seem as though managers are earnestly endeavoring to improve the quality of this portion of their programmes, but it is difficult to obtain good songs. The writers are not turning them out. However, where a good song is offered it is thoroughly appreciated. This much has been demonstrated and is or should be an encouragement to managers to persevere in their attempts to offer songs worth hearing and their slides worth seeing.

Special applause was given to slides shown this week from the studios of Scott & Van Altena, and A. L. Simpson.

WILL G. BARKER IN ENGLAND.

Results of His Visit to America.

On his return to London, Will G. Barker gave a contemporary an interview in which he summarized the results of his recent labors in America. Mr. Barker said:

"Unless some power was brought to bear, the Trust would have cut out from business about half of the exchange organizations (that is, the hiring companies) and would have gradually reduced the number of exhibitors. No exchange was to be allowed to rent films until it had received a license. Gradually these licenses would be withdrawn and the showman would be compelled to sell out at any price. Neither films nor machines would be obtained, and so a monopoly would be created which would allow the Trust to charge any prices they liked and thus make enormous profits. Four or five exchanges had already been told that they would not get further supplies. Of course this would ultimately kill the business; the exchange man would be compelled to purchase so many dollars' worth of films from each maker, for which he would have to place a standing order, which could only be cantelled by 14 days' notice. Practically he would be ordering that which might never come into existence. Such a system would kill every incentive for the maker to produce the best. The great masters of the trade are the public, and when once the public tire of living pictures so soon must the industry perish. If nine manufacturers of the Trust controlled the trade, nearly every showman would be showing the same subjects, and ruin would eventually stare them in the face. It was to combat such an evil as this and to get the American market open to our productions that I took up the cudgels with the Independents to fight for their rights. From the time I landed I tried hard to secure the Jenkins half of the Armat-Jenkins patent, which, as you know, is the basic patent of all projectors, namely, the loop and shutter. This was brought to a successful issue, and the Independents now possess a full license under the Armat-Jenkins patent, which is held by the Columbia Phonograph Company, who granted the Edison Manufacturing Company a shop license some years ago to enable that company to remain in the business. My visit has also another result, inasmuch as we have obtained the finest orders for this country and the Continent that have been despatched during the past two years. When I landed, the number of Independent exhibitors could be counted on the fingers of one hand. It would now take the fingers of both hands, aye, and the toes of 100 men, to give the total between Chicago and New York. We knew we were gaining ground although it was so difficult to organize because of the distances and the means the Trust took to terrify the smaller men. The ground still requires careful nursing, but establishing an Independent organization where there are twenty or more showmen will be a big factor in bringing about results. The Independents are not cutting prices; their subjects are a trifle higher in cost than those of the Trust. They do not ask the exchange man to buy a copy of everything, but only to buy what he cares for. He can please himself as to whether he signs the agreement, there is no restriction placed upon him, and he is free to charge what he likes for admission to the shows, but he is not allowed to resell the films. He has the advantage of choosing the subjects from 29 makers as compared with about nine different makers of the Trust, so that you see they have a great deal to gain by lining up on the right side."

Paragould, Ark.—Jim Workman will open a new moving picture theater on South Pruet street. H. Douglas is also making arrangements to open a new vaudeville and moving picture theater here.

Baltimore, Md.—Messrs. Edward T. Bates and Harry Morstein have awarded the contract for the erection of a new moving picture theater, to be located at 666 West Lexington street, to John Wright.

The C. J. Gormans Amusement Company, a well-known amusement concern, have opened an Independent film exchange in connection with their theatrical business and are in no way connected with any other film concern, but have opened a large suite of Offices in rooms adjacent to their amusement offices, and they have secured the best moving picture house in New England to supply their films. Chas. J. Gorman, the well-known theatrical manager of Summer parks, is the manager of the film department, and it is claimed the houses that have used their services since their opening have almost doubled their business. Their offices are at 120 Boylston street, Boston, Mass., Walker Building.

MOTION PICTURE PATENTS COMPANY.

THEIR POLICY AND PROCEDURE.

Exhibitors will no doubt be glad to learn that as a result of the Motion Picture Patents Company's effort in Albany a bill offered by Mr. Caughlan, which aimed to make the use of celluloid film a misdemeanor, is unlikely to become a law.

The following letter was received by the Patents Company on April 8:

"Albany, April 7, 1909.

"Chester Beecroft, Esq.,
"80 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.:

"My Dear Sir—Your letter of the 5th in opposition to Assembly Bill No. 1600 by Mr. Caughlan is at hand and contents duly noted. I hardly believe that there will be an opportunity of having a hearing on this bill this year, as the work of the Codes Committee ceases on Wednesday of this week, the Committee on Rules then takes charge.

"I hardly think the bill will be reported from the Rules Committee. Very sincerely yours,

"(Signed) CHARLES F. MURPHY."

Mr. Beecroft, of the M. P. P. Co., spent several days last week working on this matter and in opposition to the various bills against Sunday opening. He spoke before the Codes Committee in both Houses and made clear many facts regarding motion pictures, their uses and possibilities, that went far to correct a very false impression which for some time existed in the minds of both legislators and the press.

The passage of the Voss bill was also urged and will probably be put through.

TO THE OWNERS OR PROPRIETORS OF MOTION PICTURE THEATERS:

By special arrangement made with one of the largest casualty companies in this city, we hereby offer you general liability insurance which will cover damages for which you may be liable by reason of bodily injuries or death sustained in any way whatsoever, including panic or fire, by any person or persons, including your employees, in your theater or on the sidewalk immediately adjacent thereto. The liability under this policy, for an action resulting in injuries to or in the death of one person, is limited to $5,000, and the total liability for any one accident, resulting in injuries to or in the death of several persons, is limited to $10,000. This insurance continues for one year and protects you in any number of accidents.

This proposition is made believing that every proprietor or owner of a motion picture theater would desire to protect himself with such insurance, and the low rate is made possible only by reason of the fact that a large number can be brought into this combination. In order to carry through this proposition on this basis it is necessary that each exhibitor desiring this insurance send in his application immediately.

The premium for this insurance will be $30 a year for a theater with a maximum seating capacity of 500 or less, and an additional 10 cents per seat per year for all over 500 seats, payable in cash on delivery of certificate.

This insurance is issued only to licensees and upon the cancellation of license by the Patents Company the premium paid will be returned pro rata less 25 per cent.

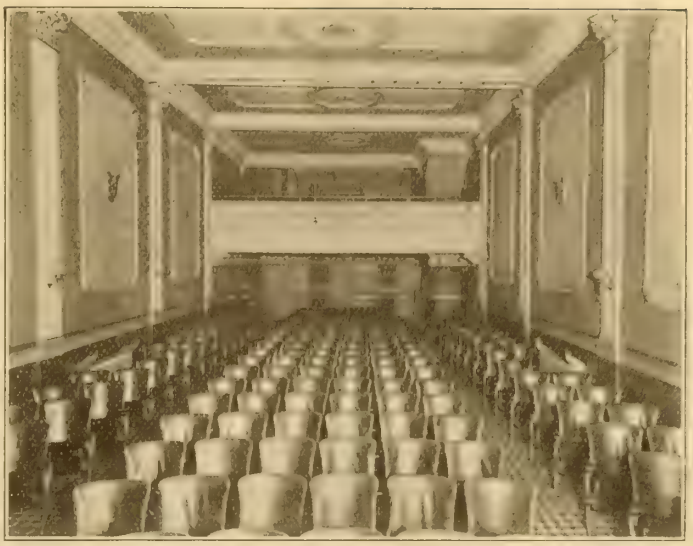
The value of such accident insurance is so well known to every business man that we need not emphasize the importance of your taking advantage of this proposition at once and sending in your application.

This offer is made through Mingle & Wood, 165 Broadway, who will issue the certificate upon receiving your application.

MOTION PICTURE PATENTS COMPANY.

"The Kiss of Judas," Pathe's Biblical subject for Holy Week, is reported to be meeting with remarkable success. Of this subject more copies have been sold than any of their films d'art, with the exception of "The Return of Ullyses." As it is a subject that will stand repeating, it is expected that re-orders will yet place this film in the lead.

Leechburg, Pa.—The Little Grand Theater opened its doors on February 20, is increasing its capacity, making it the most complete and up-to-date in this part of the State. Ted Evans is the operator, and he puts on a good show. The proprietor, W. B. Ryan, is a hustler, and if his showhouse is not always in the lead it is not his fault.



THE KNICKERBOCKER THEATER AT ROCHESTER, N. Y.

In this week's issue we present two views of the interior of the Knickerbocker Theater, at Rochester, N. Y. This theater is operated by the Knickerbocker Amusement Company. Officers: George C. Gerling, president; Wm. H. Craig, vice-president; Wm. V. Gerling, secretary and treasurer; Fred C. Gerling, manager.

The theater was opened in September, 1907, and presents high class moving pictures and illustrated songs.

In construction it ranks as one of the prettiest picture theaters in America. The lobby is done in Italian marble, plate glass mirrors with Mosaic floor. The main floor of the theater is double aisled, the seats being standard opera chairs and number 250. The auditorium is decorated in cream and gold. The machine booth is in a large fireproof room, equipped with the latest Power's machine, and every facility for safety and efficiency.

The Nickelodeon opens at 9 A. M. and closes at 11 P. M.; the performance is continuous. The theater has twenty employers and is conducted on just as high a plane as the best theaters in the counutry.

Girard, Kan.—W. E. Mattox has purchased the Airdome Theater from W. D. Bogan, and has taken possession.

The Chicago Film Exchange, by special arrangement with John Krone, of Chicago, has secured the exclusive booking rights for the United States and Canada of the "Summers-Britt Fight Pictures," which were taken before the National Sporting Club in London, England, on February 22, 1909. The pictures are said to be remarkably clear and show up the live action all through the bout. They have drawn crowded houses wherever shown.

Comments on Film Subjects.

FILMS OF THE WEEK.

The week has been made notable by the offering of the Vitagraph of "Napoleon and Josephine." The film is far above the average in conception and execution. Historically it is accurate and the acting is without blemish. The Pathes offered "The Kiss of Judas," which is technically an unusually good film. Biograph's "Drunkard's Reformation" was the dramatic feature of the early part of the week and wherever it was shown it received favorable comment.

"A Tale of the West."—The Essanay people have made some excellent films depicting life and scenes in the West. The latest from their studio has many elements of attractiveness, yet it fails to convince. While the action of the characters is undoubtedly substantially as it would be in real life, still the story is not convincing. The principal defect in this film is that the runs are much too long. It seems almost as though the band is riding over half a State both before and after they capture the thief. This weakens it and causes the audience to become weary. The setting is unusually good. The scenery pictorially is unsurpassed by anything the Essanay people have done, but the weakness pointed out detracts from the film and causes one to wish it were over.

"On the Brink of the Precipice."—In this film from the Eclipse house a story of love and jealousy is told which undoubtedly has some interest for those who are fond of that type of narrative. Two young men are suitors for the hand of the same girl. One is a dashing cavalry officer, who is not favored by the parents, but is favored by the girl. The other is a civilian, who is favored by the parents, but not by the girl. They all go mountain climbing and the girl asks the officer to procure for her a flower. In reaching over the cliff he falls. Then comes the effort of drawing him back. The guides go down by ropes and attach one to him, and very laboriously pull him up. When they have almost accomplished it, the rejected and jealous suitor attempts to cut the rope, but is detected by the girl and denounced. He is promptly kicked out of the picture. While the photography of this film is admirable, it fails to convince because it is apparent that the officer did not fall far. In fact, the fall occurs out of sight of the audience and is known only by the fright of the girl. Photographically the film is excellent, but it is not convincing.

"Inviting the Boss."—A story from the Eclipse studio which shows the disturbance caused in a humble dwelling because the man's employer had been invited to dinner. After the domestic had been conciliated and more or less of the bric-a-brac had been broken in a vain attempt to tidy up, in which the man of the house participated with disastrous results, a telegram arrived announcing that the boss couldn't keep the engagement. While this film is clearly intended as a caricature, it is, nevertheless, an illustration of the feeling which animates many who expect those above them in this world's goods to visit them.

"The Kiss of Judas."—Unquestionably the betrayal and arrest of Jesus is one of the most difficult subjects in all history to reproduce on the stage, and when the Pathes announced that they proposed to reproduce it in a motion picture there was great curiosity to see how they would handle the subject and how successful they would be. The film has been a part of the programs of the past week and so far as the art of the subject is concerned nothing is left to be desired. The art is perfect, but perhaps the fact that the art is perfect detracts in some degree from the pathos of the tragedy. The first scene is where Jesus is washing his disciples' feet. The picture of Jesus is excellent, but it fails to convince, to grip the heart with that power which is essential to make a picture truly appeal to those who see it. The next scene shows the Last Supper, during which Jesus announces that some one of those sitting at the table will betray him. The anxious look upon the faces of the twelve is excellently reproduced. The next scene is the bargain with the rabbis for the thirty pieces of silver and the arrangement of the sign by which Judas was to make known which was Jesus. Then comes the arrest, and finally the remorse and death of Judas. These scenes have been reproduced with as close fidelity to fact as is possible now, and the only one which seems to be the least out of place is the death of Judas and the exhibition of the suspended body. Perhaps it is necessary to complete the picture, but it would seem better to let that be suggested rather than actually seen. The staging is admirable and the action of the characters is beyond question a work of art, but there is not the pathos which should attach to this most emotional of all dramas. The characters fail to arouse the feeling that here is a tragedy which changed the whole of human history. The artist is so much in evidence that the meaning of the drama is obscured, and unless one is sufficiently trained to look under the surface he will fail to realize the real power of this drama. The admiration which will be aroused for the art of the actor will, in a degree, overshadow what the actor is interpreting. Messrs. Lambert and Sully, from the Comedie Francais, acted the principal parts, and the finished work of these artists is powerfully shown throughout the drama. Photographically the film is perfect and it runs so steadily that one scarcely sees a quiver during the time the scenes are on the screen.

"Incidents in the Life of Napoleon and Josephine."—To successfully depict even a portion of the dramatic scenes and incidents in the life of such a man as Napoleon, is a task of great magnitude. To succeed as admirably as the Vitagraph has done in its late effort is to be commended. Sometimes manufacturers have made the mistake of following too closely the written records of such characters. Undoubtedly it is better to suggest rather than follow slavishly. Generally a character is known by some salient development, and the character of Napoleon is one of these. But beyond the fact that the character is admirably suggested, the scenario is a marvel of historic accuracy. The manager of the company went to France for the express purpose of obtaining accurate information for this purpose. That he did so is shown by the picture itself. Both the characters of Napoleon and Josephine are presented with fidelity and power. The film opens with a scene in a garden in the West Indies, where the young Josephine is told by a fortune-teller that she will be queen. The next scene is where Napoleon and Josephine meet for the first time. The historical accuracy of the uniforms and costumes in this is interesting. The setting is beyond description. The divorce itself, the final parting, and, last of all, the memories of Napoleon at Malmaison, are all good. Of all the ambitious attempts of this house none has succeeded so admirably as this. It is a pity that the daily changes give it only a short run. It should have more.

"Unappreciated Genius."—This so-called comedy doesn't seem to have any point at all. It does not get a laugh, scarcely a smile. A comic ought, at least, to be clear enough so the audience can understand what it means. Without some comprehension of the subject it is impossible to appreciate the story.

"Father's First Half-Holiday."—An Edison comedy which travesties the half-holiday of the average clerk. It may be funny, but the situations are so overdrawn that the average audience does not see much sport in it. No one in real life ever makes such a consummate fool of himself.

"The Riviera."—The Gaumonts have produced a record film which gives a good idea of this famous resort. The toning reproduces very nicely the color of the rocks and brings out the values of the foliage and buildings.

"The Prodigal Daughter."—The Gaumonts have produced a film which has many pictorial qualities, but is lacking in plot and moral. The matter of a daughter leaving home and her father going insane, to be brought back to his reason by the return of the daughter, may, perhaps, be interesting to the French, but its ending is unnatural and does not appeal to American audiences. Technically the film cannot be questioned, but this is all that can be said in its favor.

"The Schoolboy's Revenge."—A schoolboy is chastised by all his relatives for his dullness in his studies. He immediately proceeds to repay them for their discipline in a way that is amply conpensatory. He procures a quantity of glue and carefully paints every chair. When they sit down they adhere very firmly to the seats, and the spectacle of a dozen or so people parading through the street with chairs sticking to them is comical and the laughter is hearty. It is a Pathe and more successful than some of Pathe's comics.

"Parisian Life in Miniature."—A Pathe in which children are shown dressed in the clothes of their elders and imitate them in their various social functions, such as calling, going to restaurants, duelling and other features of French life. The absurdity of it makes the film interesting, and it is well received.

CORRESPONDENCE.

AN EXHIBITOR ON THE FILM SUPPLY.

Chicago, Ill., April 2, 1909.

Editor The Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—As an exhibitor and owner of four 5-cent theaters I would like to say a few words regarding the picture business.

It is a grand and interesting amusement and all the factories in the Association are surely making wonderful improvements.

The Biograph, Selig, Kalem, Pathe and Vitagraph companies get out good, clear, lively photography and have high class and high salaried artists. The days for amateur actors and actresses in making moving pictures is past. High salaried artists are employed by some of these and the factory profits by having the best of talent.

I am a very strong Patents Company booster, but I will say that if some of its licensees don't wake up the Independent will beat them out.

The way the ———'s film jumps is awful. The Gaumont and Eclipse have added greatly to the Motion Picture Patents Company and are greatly welcomed by the exhibitors. There is no excuse for such pictures as some licensed makers turn out. They are poor in photography, actors and in many other ways. And again, the announcements are very dim and bad, and all letter writing cannot be read over 25 feet from the curtain.

Now is the time to get up and deliver the goods and show the exhibitors what we Americans can do. I will say, in my judgment, the European factories have the American factories beat in many respects, especially in making titles, letters and reading matter larger and plainer.

Copy after the Biograph, they deliver the goods and all exhibitors are fighting for them, while they avoid other makes of films—no need to mention names.

Believe me, I am most sincere, and I feel confident 90 per cent. of the exhibitors will join me and support this letter.

Yours in good faith,

AN EXHIBITOR.

A CRY FOR PROTECTION.

Columbus, Miss., March 31, 1909.

Editor The Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—Having received, perused and salubriously digested your number of March 27, 1909, we must vote it the most poignant and spicy editorially avowed missile hurled at the depleting tendencies of the M. P. P. Co. that has, to our limited vision, appeared on the moving picture screen.

The apropos nascent effect thereof causes our prompt decision to renew our subscription and thereby encourage the worthy onslaught by promptly inclosing herewith the necessary sixteen bits, to be placed to our subscription credit, thence applied to the wide-open neutral publicity of the campaign now on between these warring factions for a fitful survival.

Our grievance, not differing widely, we judge, from our fraternal brothers, starts with the slipping from our fingers that piece of lucre which has failed in every vistage to revive and benefit our prospects, which was so inveigling and seductively portrayed to us. So we confess our disappointment in the ameliorating effects of the memento we obtained from said M. P. P. Co., viz, our privileged diploma.

Blithely inscribed thereon appeared a seal and inscription granting us the privilege of feasting their provender, should our vital endurance continue until July 1, when we are expected to again come across. Notwithstanding, twice since said recipience we have found it necessary to haul down our potent sceptre and ward off encroachments of what we had grasped, as we supposed, paternal guardianship of our well-earned stipend.

Near the closing days of January last, we ventured a satirical rhapsody to the M. P. World regarding the prophetic advent of said M. P. P. Co., wherein we foreshadowed what has been and still is grafting and fattening on the forced duplicity of the exhibitors.

But to our beloved contemporary our missive appeared in apropos. However, our observations since lead us to believe that same was fully opportune. But be the reminiscent predictions as they may, we can now behold the omens, as depicted in the World, that there must be a countervailing move made across the muddy chasm by the Patents Company or a surrender to emasculation must follow.

The Moving Picture World surely is deserving of unlimited credit, and should receive the combined support and patronage of the American exhibitors for verified immunity from trust influence.

The fever of apathy of the Patents Company, we are sure, is as conspicuous to the World's reading patrons, as to ourselves, and unless merit promptly intervenes and is heralded by the M. P. World, there will be, in our opinion, recalcitrants galore passing up their little Patent charm.

We have a budget of concepts and hypotheses we can administer should the virulence continue, if desired.

Respectfully,
THEATER VAUDETTE.

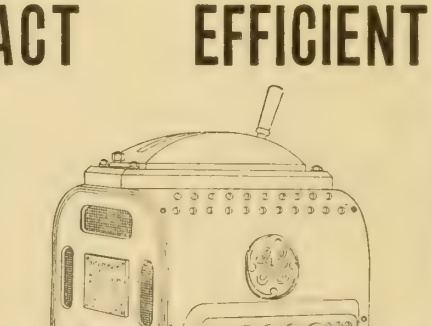
TRANSFORMER

For Moving Picture Machines
(Alternating Current)

SIMPLE COMPACT EFFICIENT

THIS TRANSFORMER, KNOWN AS "THE G. E. ECONOMY-ARC" mustof necessity be an invaluable adjunct to any alternating current moving picture installation. THE ADVANTAGES OF A TRANSFORMER FOR THIS WORK WILL BE APPRECIATED by both the theatre management and operator; BY THE MANAGEMENT in the reduction of light bills and in the better production of the pictures due to the steady light obtained, AND BY THE OPERATOR in the simplicity of the device, the absence of danger from shocks,, and the added comfort in the lamp house due to the low heating.



Price, $75.00

THE SAVING IN POWER INSURED BY THE USE OF A TRANSFORMER INSTEAD OF A RHEOSTAT VARIES FROM 65 to 90 per cent., depending upon the voltage from the supply mains. Many lighting companies require the use of 220 volts for moving picture work in order to avoid heavily loading one side of a three wire system. This increases the loss considerably in circuits using a resistance or reactive device for reducing the voltage.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

CONFIDENCE.—A beautiful romance of a girl from the Golden West. Confidence is the flower grown from the seed of true friendship, watered by the tears of adversity, and often assailed by the blight of calumny. For as Shakespeare says, "be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny." So it was with little Nellie Burton, the orphan girl of the rancho, who budding into womanhood, realizes her position and appreciates the low brutal character of the habitues of the place, even discerning the true nature of her fancied sweetheart, Jim Colt, who was to say the least an unconscionable villain. Tiring of her present environments she decides to leave the place and seek a nobler and higher life. To this end she makes her way eastward and applies for a position as nurse at a New York hospital, and we next find her engaged in that work of mercy "ministering to the sick." Her mild manners and pure nature impress the head surgeon, a man of eminence in his profession, to such an extent that he finds himself deeply in love with this poor self-sacrificing girl. He proposes marriage, which she at first mildly declines, but he at length dissuades her, and they are married. However, there must come a cloud, and this is in the shape of her girlhood sweetheart, Colt, who has migrated East, and living on his wits. He runs across Nellie in the company with her husband as she enters her own home. The low conniving nature at once asserts itself and he plans a scheme of blackmail, using as capital her pure innocent love letters. Waiting a favorable opportunity Jim Colt "visits" her and with a threat of showing these letters to her husband he extorts money from her. This gone he comes for more, and as she has no ready cash he takes her jewels. The money raised on these goes the same way, so he calls to make another demand. This the poor helpless girl finds unable to meet, and during their argument the surgeon enters. Colt then hands the missives over to the husband who, taking the packet throws them into the fire and has Colt forcibly ejected from the place, with the positive injunction never to return. Length, 973 feet.

THE WINNING COAT.—It is said that the coat does not make the man, but it must be admitted that it goes a long way toward working out his destiny. So it was that the aforementioned article of wearing apparel brought about justice on the one hand and future happiness on the other for the young courtier upon whose shoulders it hung. This gallant youth, handsome, ambitious and brave, mild in manner, but quick to resent an insult, engages in a duel with another of the court, and is surprised by the King, who has issued a strong edict against duelling. For the offense he is arrested but paroled. Now, the young fellow is deeply enamored of one of the ladies of the court, to meet whom he breaks his parole. He is caught, stripped of his regalia and banished from court. There is among the courtiers a party of conspirators who have plotted to abduct the Queen and hold her hostage for ransom. At the tavern, the leader is given a letter setting forth their plans, which he cautiously reads and thrusts into his coat pocket, and sits down to while away the time gambling. Our hero enters and being despondent wishes to forget his woe by entering the game, but he has only his hat and plume to wager, still this is accepted. The fates are with him: he wins again and again until he has the party cleaned—the conspirator even of his sword and coat. Putting on the coat, he feels the letter in the pocket, and reading it learns "climb to the balcony hall at midnight. We seize the Queen then." He decides at once to save the Queen and hurries to the balcony hall through the window and has barely time to hide in a large clock when three conspirators enter. At this moment the Queen appears on the way to her apartments, and the conspirators creep out to perpetrate their foul design, when our hero leaps to the fore, and taking them so by surprise he manages to hold them at bay until assistance comes. For this deed he is not only released from his parole, but is given the hand of his sweetheart and dubbed Knight. So much for the Winning Coat. Length, 767 feet.

A SOUND SLEEPER.—Somniferous Sam, a knight of the road, otherwise tramp, possessed auto-soporiferous qualities that beat Rip Van Winkle to a frazzle. When he fell asleep, which was often, an earthquake or cyclone couldn't arouse him. Our introduction to the gentleman occurs when we see him seized with this lethargic torpescence approaching and lying down upon the soft side of a hemlock plank. Shortly after a fight between a mob of roughs, who sprawl and tumble all over him, but he simply snores forth that beautiful nocturne, "Please go 'way and let me sleep." He finally gets up and makes his way to a large barrel labeled "ashes." In he crawls and sleeps, and is soon buried in ashes contributed by the house wives of the neighborhood—still he sleeps. A cart backs up and carries the barrel to the dump, where he and ashes are deposited—still he sleeps. Having completed his devotions at the shrine of Morpheus he gets up, brushes his clothes with a pocket whisk, and saunters off. Length, 214 feet.

IN THE DAYS OF WITCHCRAFT.—Synopsis of scenes: Nancy and Jack, her sweetheart, start merrily enough for the May dance on the village green, where they encounter Lord Craven, a dissolute roue, who lays a wager with his roystering companions that he will succeed in getting a kiss from Nancy.

During the May-pole dance Craven attempts to win his wager but meets with a hearty repulse and retires discomfited to the White Horse Tavern vowing vengeance, to the amusement of his companions.

Jack, learning of Craven's misconduct, seeks him out and a desperate fight ensues in which Jack is rendered unconscious by a blow from Craven's heavy walking stick. When Jack recovers his mind is blank, he is idiotic.

Craven denounces Nancy as a witch, claiming that she has bewitched Jack. A warrant is issued and Nancy is arrested, tried and sentenced to be burned at the stake, unless she uses her alleged art of witchcraft to restore Jack's reason. She fails to do so. Jack recovers his reason, learns of his sweetheart s great danger and reaches the public square just as the torch is about to be applied. Nancy is saved to the delight of the villagers.

Craven, hidden in the crowd, is seen and recognized by Jack who drags him forth. The truth comes out. The Governor orders the arrest of Craven, who is taken away, while Jack and Nancy return home to give thanks for their providential delivery. Length, 1,000 feet.

THE INTERRUPTED JOY RIDE.—Mr. Simkins decides to buy an automobile. After inspecting several, decides on a large car. While driving home in the machine, his chauffeur is arrested on account of overspeeding. The question presents itself as to who will drive the car the balance of the journey, and Mr. Simkins is prevailed upon by his friends to run the car. He consents and they start on the "Joy Ride."

Having no knowledge of the handling of the automobile, Mr. Simkins has his own troubles. His first encounter is with an old farmer pushing a wheelbarrow, and the farmer barely escapes with his life. He enlists the services of a police officer who attempts to follow the fast disappearing car. A tramp lying in a nook by the roadside barely escapes. Two lovers in a hammock are upset into the car in its mad drive.

Mr. Simkins' troubles are not ended, for a picnic party having lunch in the woods are scattered. A nurse pushing a baby in a carriage is the next target and the carriage upsets. She chases the automobile, and, as it stops, climbs aboard, but they manage to shake her off.

The chase of the joy riders is brought to a sudden stop by another automobile and thus Mr. Simkins ends his trip by being arrested and placed in jail. Length, 500 feet.

THE OTHER FELLOW; Or, A Fight for Love.—Cupid's work was ever of a troublesome nature. Two chums, Tom and Andy, become rivals for the hand of the fair Clara. She finds she loves both fellows and consequently is unable to determine which to accept.

The rivals are not content to leave the all-important question to the fair maid for her decision, but every time they meet, argue the matter and end in a fight. The first encounter results in torn clothing and injured faces with honors about even.

At their next meeting, a few days later, the battle is renewed, but this time with sabres. Such weapons, however, are only for those skilled in the use of them and the boys end up in a second fist fight. Another encounter follows the next day with revolvers, but they are poor targets for each other and wind up with the usual method of "fists."

Meanwhile the fair Clara is wooed and won by an impetuous Frenchman. They are quietly married to avoid unpleasant scenes with the fighting "rivals."

The boys, however, hear of the Frenchman's successful suit and hasten to learn how true it may be. They meet the happy wedded couple about to start on their honeymoon and are introduced to the non-fighting "winner" to their utter disgust, each blaming the other for the loss of the girl. Length, 475 feet.

THE RUBES AND THE BUNCO MEN.—The opening scene of this comedy shows the arrival of a typical Rube and his daughter from the rural districts. Leaving the depot of a well known railroad in a large metropolis, they are spotted by two bunco men on the outlook for victims, and cautiously trailed. The sharpers, laying their plans en route, take a short cut and secure material for their game.

They happen upon a magnificent team of horses attached to a carriage standing alone in front of a residence, and after placing a sign upon carriage "For Sale $25.00," they await the coming of their victims. The Rubes, much taken with the splendid turnout, immediately purchase the outfit and drive off in state. The sharpers again head off the Rubes and place a large sign in a conspicuous place upon a swell mansion. The sign reads "This property in exchange for a team and carriage and so much cash to boot." One of the sharpers disguises himself, makes the exchange, secures the cash, and they both drive off in the vehicle. The Rube and his daughter are thrown out of the house by a footman and hurry away in search of the team.

the sharpers drive the team back to its original stand and hurriedly disappear just as the owner and his coachman come out of the house. As the owner is about to step into the carriage, the Rube and his daughter rush upon the scene demanding the return of the rig. After a considerable struggle, the Rubes are ejected and the team drives away. A sudden revelation comes to the victims that they have been buncoed. Length, 500 feet.

THE CHAPERONE.—O. Howe Gruffe, a business man, is a widower with a beautiful daughter. A young college chap, Charley Duncan, has fallen desperately in love with the daughter and she with him. O. Howe Gruffe finding them making love in his house, throws Charley out, and unmoved by the tears of his daughter, informs her sternly that she must never see Charley again without a chaperone. The daughter 'phones Charley and tells him he must secure a chaperone, then everything will be all right.

Charley, at his quarters in the college grounds, is in the blackest depths of despair, when his room mate pounces into the room and Charley conceives the idea of dressing his friend up in woman's clothes and passing him off as "The Chaperone." Charley's friend consents to help him out of his dilemma, and laughs with glee at participating in such a good joke.

After much difficulty the friend is dressed and they proceed to the home of Charley's heart's desire. Arriving there, Charley's presence angers O. Howe Gruffe, but upon being presented, leaves the young people to themselves, as he falls desperately in love with "The Chaperone."

The Chaperone evades all the old man's advances and causes great consternation to Charley when the young lady's dress arrives, and she insists on the Chaperone helping her put it on. Charley has to confide in her who the Chaperone really is, and she flees to her room hastily.

The Chaperone makes merry with O. Howe Gruffe, and Charley tells the Chaperone to get Gruffe's written consent to his daughter's marriage to Charley. The Chaperone agrees and when O. Howe Gruffe begs for a kiss, the Chaperone tells him that for his written consent to his daughter's marriage to Charley he can take it.

O. Howe Gruffe gives it and claims his reward. As he embraces the Chaperone the wig falls off disclosing his identity. O. Howe Gruffe in anger demands the return of the agreement, but the Chaperone gives it to Charlie, who takes his sweetheart in his arms, and the friend doffs his female garments, laughing at O. Howe Gruffe's rage. Length, 550 feet.

THE ORANGE GROWER'S DAUGHTER.—This film shows a trip to Florida, to the famous orange groves. We show you trees laden with luscious fruit and you will see what a paradise on earth this beautiful country is. And while we are giving you a glimpse of this interesting section of the Sunny South we shall tell you a story of love and adventure. Stella, the beautiful daughter of a wealthy orange grower, has promised her hand to a fine young fellow, Jim Carroll, the son of a neighbor. But Stella has aroused the passions of a Cuban, her father's overseer, and this man, taking advantage of the father's absence, attempts to carry Stella away to Cuba by force. He nearly accomplishes his desperate purpose, but is frustrated by Jim, who rescues the girl after a fight against almost overwhelming odds. All of the scenes were taken by the Kalem Company's Stock Company, on the St. John's River, Florida.

CHARLIE FORCED TO FIND A JOB.—"Father is rich and mother don't care" is adequately demonstrated in this series of views. Accustomed to having all expenses paid and "painting the town" to his heart's delight, Charlie is "stung" when, after an unusual carousal, the parental remonstrances to his rapid pace are so marked and effective that he finds himself on the outside of his heretofore "Garden of Eden."

Various efforts are made to secure funds to maintain a living, but Charlie is unsuccessful and goes from bad to worse. However, he manages to make his several attempts at times when his parents are present, much to their humiliation and disgust.

What was intended for a punishment for Charlie has a reactionary effect upon his family and they sue for peace. All possible concessions are made and every inducement offered if he will only return. Length, 539 feet.

IN THE LIME LIGHT.—A street fakir is seen to extoll the virtues of an improved mechanism for which he claims unlimited qualities.

He induces a maiden to look into the apparatus with a view of seeing her future husband. A young hopeful wishes to see his prospective wife. Another desiring to prove his pedigree, calls for views of his ancestors. A fourth person has a yearning to see what his children will be like and finally an inquisitive man is imbued with the desire to see his mother-in-law.

All are satisfied so far as the mere satisfaction of their curiosity is concerned, but far from being pleased with the realization of their ideals. Length, 589 feet.

UNDER SUSPICION.—This story illustrates the anguish undergone by a person of jealous disposition. The devoted wife and child are planning for a celebration on the event of papa's birthday. Father is requested to go on an errand while the two lay their plans; later he surprises the daughter writing a letter; a gold handled cane, intended as a gift, carelessly left on the lawn by the servant, who hurries away at the sound of his master's approaching footsteps, and unexpectedly coming upon his wife picking a bouquet, cause jealousy to arise in the man's heart, never dreaming that what he deems evidence of infelicity is really evidence of love and devotion. When the morning of his birthday dawns his demeanor is sullen. The surprise awaiting him in the demonstrations of affection is overwhelming and he shamefacedly accepts the offerings and vows never again to permit distrust to dominate his actions. Length, 589 feet.

POLICEMAN IN ACTION.—A rip-roaring comedy is rendered in the specific action brought about by a policeman, who, in answer to an advertisement, secures a pair of electric boots.

Unfortunately the appliances are put in connection with a trolley wire and generate an enormous power and the officer loses control of himself. Length, 367 feet.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

A PLOT FOILED.—A little shepherd lad engaged at his work in the pasture overhears a plot to rob his master. He is detected by the conspirators, but feigning sleep is not molested. After the men have left to carry out their diabolical plot he hurries back to the house and through the window he sees the men at work. He quickly secures a shotgun from the storeroom and firing through the window he hits one of the men in the foot and causes them to seek safety in flight.

He liberates his employer and sounds the alarm, whereupon the police arrive and pursue the fleeing culprits, who are soon apprehended.

The lad wins the well merited praise of his master and the latter also appreciates than in the boy he has a very desirable employee. Length, 354 feet.

A BACHELOR'S PERSISTENCE.—A confirmed bachelor, possessed of all the attributes and characteristics of a charter member of his class, falls a victim to the unerring darts of Dan Cupid and with the same persistence with which he previously sought to evade the meshes of matrimonial entanglements he now strives to enter the realm of connubial bliss.

He serenades the object of his affection, offers gifts of every description, and seeks by every possible means to ingratiate himself with the young lady. All efforts are unavailing, he is ordered from the premises, expulsed and subjected to all manner of humiliation, but instead of his ardor being dampened he is spurred on all the more to accomplish his purpose.

Finally fate smiles kindly upon him and he is given the opportunity to prove himself the hero in a thrilling rescue scene. For this he is received with open arms and both live happy ever after. Length, 555 feet.

THE CURSE OF GOLD.—The Miser.—While mother and daughter receive the tailor to order some clothes, the miser enters. He throws the tailor out of the room and scolds the women for being so extravagant. He then sends them out of the room and sits down to count his money. Hearing steps he takes the money, which he loves more than anything else on earth. He carries it down to a secret vault in the cellar which is securely protected by a heavy iron door.

Coercing the Poor.—The miser enters the room of a poor family. The husband lies on the death bed. The wife with four children has not enough to feed the little mouths. The miser enters with two gendarmes. He wants his money or his money's worth. There being no money in the house he takes the furniture and what else he finds in the room.

The Greed for Money.—While walking down the street a poor beggar woman asks the miser for alms. He pushes her aside. Unfortunately she falls, whereby her pennies roll over the sidewalk. Greedy for money the miser picks up a few pennies and walks away.

"Have You No Conscience?"—The miser is visiting one of his titled indebtors. He presents a note for payment, but the nobleman cannot meet his note. He tells the miser that he will be forced to kill himself if he insists on payment. "Do it, do it," says the miser. The nobleman lifts a pistol to his forehead. Just then the young wife enters and shows the miser the door. Threatening, he leaves.

God's Punishment.—The miser returned home. He goes to the cellar to store away his gold. He enters the secret vault. Accidentally the door closes and as there is no possibility of opening the door from the inside, the miser is buried alive. Upon his knees he offers gold to God. Still the door is closed. He offers more and more. He is mad with fear. Suddenly the visions of those whom he coerced pass through the cave in endless procession. Senseless he drops to the floor. Length, 740 feet.

MY FRIEND, MR. DUMMY.—Philip has a good time at his club. While going home he passes a clothing store. He runs into a dummy, excuses himself and immediately sees great fun ahead for him. He invites the dummy to a glass of beer. Enraged through the refusal of the dummy to drink, he starts a fight. A policeman interferes but fares very badly. The dummy is run over by an automobile and Philip is paid hush money. The servant girl cleaning the windows drops the bucket from the third story. It hits the dummy.

The lady of the house, thinking somebody was killed, faints. Many more incidents and accidents happen. At last the proprietor of the clothing store discovers the loss of his dummy. A chase ensues. At last the dummy is discovered, but in a badly battered condition. The storekeeper's sorrow, however, is turned into joy when he finds in the pocket of the dummy's suit the hush money which had been paid to Phil. Length, 250 feet.

AFTER THE BACHELOR'S BALL.—A bachelor after the ball is somewhat troubled with headache. He lies upon the lounge and suddenly sees the statue of Venus, which is standing in his room, getting alive. When he wants to embrace her, she vanishes. He is so mad about this that he discharges the butler who has just entered. As he is not able to attend to the house himself he advertises for a housekeeper to call on him the next morning at 10 A. M.

At 10 A. M. The residence of the bachelor is besieged by women all anxious to serve as housekeeper. They break into the house, they follow him from room to room until at last they are held at bay by a fat Irish woman who drives them out and presents herself to the bachelor as his new housekeeper. The bachelor is glad to have found such a treasure, but when the Irish woman makes goo-goo eyes at him he runs away.

Next Afternoon at 2 P. M.—About fifty women have come to answer the advertisement. Every gentleman that passes is accosted by the women who are anxious to meet the bachelor. When he at last appears he is driven to flight by the love-crazed women and some exceedingly fine chases take place. At last he is caught.

Wasn't that a Terrible Dream?—One of the women is just dragging him away when he wakes up. "Oh, such a headache!" Length, 685 feet..

PATHE FRERES.

OLIVER CROMWELL.—This richly colored picture delineates some important events in the life of Oliver Cromwell subsequent to his conquering the throne of England. The first scene is in the Palace of White Hall, where news has just arrived that the "Roundheads" are hourly gaining strength and the fall of Charles is imminent. Queen Henrietta is getting ready to flee, but Charles is determined to remain steadfast and stand by the Cavaliers.

The next picture shows us Cromwell's camp, where the latter's daughter, Elizabeth, is begging her father to give up the struggle against the King, but Cromwell remains inflexible and orders his daughter out of the camp. Elizabeth dresses in the costume of a Cavalier and presents herself to the King, to whom she offers her services; she is accepted and rides forth to battle to fight for her King.

The Cavaliers have just lost the battle of Neseby, and a party of the latter, who are endeavoring to aid the King in his flight are put to death by the enemy. The unknown Cavalier (Elizabeth), seeing that the King is in great danger, begs him to change costumes, which the monarch does and the latter makes his escape, while the young Cavalier in the robes of the King faces the enemy. Cromwell soon arrives and thinking that he has captured the King, orders him to dismount, and great is his horror when he recognizes his own daughter. One of the soldiers draws from the King's pocket the papers which will bring Charles' head to the block.

After this occurrence the Scotch offer their hospitality to King Charles, and he goes to Newcastle. Cromwell, however, bribes the Scotch and the latter betray the King and give him up to his enemies. Charles is then condemned to death, and on January 30, 1649, he is executed in front of the Palace of White Hall. Length, 804 feet.

THE GENERAL'S FIANCEE.—An old general who has enjoyed the freedom of bachelorhood for many years, finally decides to marry a very attractive woman who has been fortunate enough to win his love. After escorting his lady love to her dwelling, he returns to his own home, where, after writing a note to his brother, hands it to his groom with instructions to deliver it at once. The brother and his family, upon receiving the missive, hurry to the home of the old general, who receives them very cordially, and after a short conversation, he informs his relatives that he is about to take a wife. The family, fearing that they will lose their right to claim his vast fortune, are thunderstruck, and remonstrate with the old man, but to no avail, for his word is final. After the distracted relatives leave, the general gives orders to his servant to bring him his shoes, which the latter does. The young nephew steals into the room unseen and during the old fellow's absence the precocious youth stuffs the toes of the shoes with paper. When the general gets the shoes on and starts out to pay his fiancee a call, he is tortured nearly to distraction, so is compelled to remove them before he reaches his destination. Finally, arriving at the home of his lady love, he comes in very gallantly, and as the charming Miss greets her lover, the latter's nephew gets in some of his fine work again, this time by fastening a string to the wig of the adored one, and right in the midst of the courtesies the boy pulls the string, which drags off the wig, leaving the horrified woman entirely bald headed. The old general on seeing her in such an unattractive guise, makes his escape and starts for home. On the road he meets the mischievous youth, whom he tells of his great disappointment, and promises the boy to remain a bachelor and leave the latter all his money. Length, 430 feet.

THE TEAMSTER'S DAUGHTER.—An old teamster leaves his pretty daughter at their cottage and rides away to market on a burro. Shortly after his departure the girl's fiance comes upon the scene and the happy couple go for a stroll through the beautiful wildwood, where the maiden blushingly listens to the youth's declarations of love. Finally, the pair return to the cottage, where, after taking his leave, the young man strolls off to the village cafe. While at the latter place, he meets his sweetheart's father and the two enjoy some refreshments together. During their conversation the old man produces a large roll of bills. At the sight of the money the youth is seized with a desire to possess it, and shortly after the old man's departure, he starts out in pursuit. Overtaking the old fellow in a lonely part of the wood, the youth conceals himself behind a rock and fires, mortally wounding the old man, who falls in a heap on the ground. The culprit then rifles his victim's pockets and makes way with his money. In his excitement, however, he forgets his gun, which remains lying on the round beside the wounded man.

The old burro makes its way to the house, and when the girl sees the empty saddle, she realizes at once that something has befallen her father, so starts out to search for him. She goes but a short distance when she comes upon the old man lying on the ground mortally wounded. He is just able to gasp a few words to his child and then passes away in her arms. The girl picks up the gun, and recognizing it at once as the property of her fiance, starts out to avenge the death of her father. Coming upon the murderer, who stands counting the money back of a barn, she levels the gun without a word of warning and fires, killing him instantly. Length, 328 feet.

VAMPIRES OF THE COAST.—A band of outlaws on the sea coast make their miserable and dishonest living by luring ships from their course to be dashed to pieces on the rockbound coast. They tie a lantern on the horns of a cow and lead her along the beach, and the ship, seeing its gleam, heads for the light, and as a consequence is soon on the rocks, where it is dashed to pieces. The pirates gather up the rich merchandise as it floats to shore, and make the surviving crew and passengers prisoners, taking them to a cave, where the casks and boxes are broken open and the spoils distributed among the gang. One of the wreckers saves the life of one of the passengers, the beautiful daughter of a wealthy family, who has lost consciousness after battling with the waves, and he tries to make the unfortunate girl as comfortable as possible in her squalid surroundings. The rest of the robbers imbibe too freely of the contents of some of the casks and before long it has its effect and they all fall asleep. The young fellow, seizing this opportunity, takes the girl and leads her out of the place, and after many adventures he manages to take her to her home, which is a beautiful manor. Her friends, who are worried lest she is lost in the storm, are overjoyed at having her safely returned, and as a mark of appreciation they invite the youth to stay and accept their hospitality. He gladly consents, for he is deeply in love with the maiden, and it is not long before she lets him know that the feeling is mutual. His visit to her home is one of joy and happiness, and eventually the happy young couple are married. Length, 590 feet.

THE RINGLEADER.—Among a lot of hard-working men in a lumber yard is one indolent fellow, who is caught loafing by the president of the concern, who discharges the lazy fellow on the spot. The latter waits at the gate for his fellow-workmen, whom he infuses with an arbitrary feeling, and putting himself up as their ringleader, persuades them to strike out of sympathy for his untimely discharge, also to receive more pay and shorter hours. The group hold an indignation meeting and all sign an agreement to quit work except the foreman of the yard and his son, who are not in sympathy with the cause, having a large family of little ones depending upon their wages. The next day, when the latter are at work, the mob of ruffians surround their home and wreck the place with stones, driving the terrified family nearly to distraction by their nefarious conduct. Under the guidance of their ringleader the strikers then go to the office of the president and present their terms, but only meet with a cold rebuff from the stern old man, who orders them all off of his premises. Bent upon having revenge, the angry mob rush into the yard and attack the foreman and his son, and when the fracas is ended the youth is lying dead on the ground, while the cowardly mob makes a hasty departure. The heart-broken father carries the lifeless form of his son home to the afflicted family, and they are a pitiful little group in the dire distress which their adherence to honor and righteousness has brought upon them. The last picture shows the little family of mourners returning from the funeral of the innocent victim, and the same mob of cowards are there with heads bent low, for they have had time to ponder over the rash act and feel the pangs of remorse. The old president addresses the men, and in his speech points out to them their folly in following the precepts of their cowardly leader. His words have the desired effect upon the conscience-stricken men and each one gives his word of honor to return to work, after which they turn on their leader and mete out to him his just punishment. Length, 594 feet.

THE RETURN OF ULYSSES.—Ulysses is a legendary Greek hero, who, when the expedition against Troy was resolved upon, enlisted and devoted himself to the cause, which eventually proved a failure. When Troy has fallen and Ulysses sets sail for home, his ships are driven to different lands, where his adventures are numerous, keeping him away from his native land for ten years. As time rolls on without his return he is looked upon as dead by everyone except his wife, Queen Penelope, who firmly believes that her husband still lives and will some day return to her. The people of Ithaca are very anxious to have their Queen marry again, but this she stoutly refuses to do, insisting that her little son Telemachus alone shall be their King. Many suitors present themselves at the palace as aspirants for the beautiful Penelope's hand, but they get very little encouragement, as she remains steadfast in her belief that Ulysses will eventually come back. Finally, driven to desperation by the repeated entreaties of the high priest, Penelope consents to marry one of her many admirers, but makes it clearly understood that the wedding shall not take place until she has completed a piece of tapestry on which she has been working during her lonely hours of waiting for her husband's return. In order to protract the time, she rips out at night the work that she has accomplished during the day. One night, after putting her little son to bed, Penelope falls asleep beside his cot, and in a dream sees Ulysses enter the room and bend over Telemachus, kissing the child fondly on the brow, after which he turns a pleading look in her direction and disappears. Upon awakening, Penelope, taking the dream as a good omen, meaning that Ulysses still lives and is striving to come to her, goes over to the tapestry and rips out the work done that day. As she pulls out the threads one by one she is unconscious of the fact that she is being watched by her maid Myrrah, who stands aghast as she realizes what her mistress's action means. The indiscreet Myrrah loses no time in betraying Penelope's secrets, and the suitors, upon hearing how their Queen has been deceiving them, rush into the palace just in time to see Penelope destroying a large portion of the tapestry. After remonstrating with the frightened woman, they rush from the palace, destroying everything in their path. The next scene shows Ulysses returning to his native land, and as he enters the palace he comes upon the prostrate form of an old servant who has felt the wrath of the infuriated mob. Upon hearing the old man's story of the existing state of affairs, Ulysses, with his habitual quickness of decision, changes garments with the old servant and enters his home in this disguise. He is met by his wife's many suitors, who are living riotously on his estates, and who treat the tottering old stranger with scant courtesy; his own little son being the only one who offers him a glass of wine to quench his burning thirst. Penelope then appears and informs those assembled that she has decided to wed the one among them who can bend the bow of Ulysses. The most persistent suitor steps up and endeavors to wield the gigantic weapon, but without success. Finally Ulysses himself comes forward and to the amazement of all present bends the bow with ease and sends the arrow straight to the heart of his wife's tormentor. The friends of the wounded man rush for Ulysses, but the latter, throwing off his disguise, seizes his sword and succeeds in slaying the wretches who were planning to wrest his kingdom from him. The happy Penelope, scarcely able to believe that at last her hopes have been realized, throws her arms about her hero's neck and weeps tears of joy for his safe return. Length, 925 feet.

CONVICT'S REVENGE.—A "chain gang" are seen on the highway near the prison, where they are working under the watchful eye of a guard, who stands near well armed and ready to fire in case any one of the prisoners tries to escape. One unruly fellow, who gives the guard plenty of trouble, manages to evade the latter's careful scrutiny and steals away. When the prisoners are counted at the gate it is discovered that one is missing, and immediately the posse set out to apprehend him. The fugitive has a good headway, but it is not long before his pursuers are close upon him. He manages to throw them off of his track by concealing himself behind some rocks on the sea coast, and when the officers come to the spot, they, thinking that the fugitive has jumped into the water, scan the surface and fire in the direction in which they believe he swam. Finally, giving him up as lost, they turn back, but after a little while the fellow comes from his hiding place and manages to make his way to the home of the warden, to whom he owes a grudge, and whose child he has decided to kidnap. It is not long, however, before the youngster is missed and again the posse set out in pursuit. They overtake him on the highway, and are about to shoot at him, but the latter for self-protection holds the child up to receive the bullet in case they fire. Keeping his would-be captors at a good distance he runs along the road, but all the while the mother of the little one is pleading with him to release her child. Finally he returns the youngster to her mother. Length, 436 feet.

SAD AWAKENING.—A fisher maiden is seen going down to the sea where she meets a dashing army officer who falls in love with her. He follows the girl to her cottage and at an opportune time drops a note in her lap which tells her to meet him that night at the crossroads. The innocent girl, feeling flattered to be the choice of such a noble-looking man, goes at the appointed time and meets the stranger. The latter takes her to his home, where he prevails upon her to remain, and to write a letter to her old parents, telling them that she is with the one whom she loves and begging their forgiveness for her untimely departure. We next see the maiden as mistress of the beautiful establishment, where she has everything that her heart desires, wearing the finest clothes and appearing extremely happy in her rich surroundings. One day after three years of her happy life has elapsed, she receives a note from her lover telling her that he is forced by his people to marry a woman of wealth and their relations must cease there and then. The heart-broken girl, who now has a little daughter, takes the child and returns to her old home, where she meets with a cruel rebuff from her parents for her indiscreet actions. Disheartened, she leaves the child in the care of neighbors, and rushes to the sea, where she is about to end it all. Her father, at last realizing the true situation, follows her, and to his horror sees the poor girl jump into the water. He leaps in and is successful in bringing her safely to shore, where, with the aid of sympathetic neighbors, they carry the unconscious woman to her old home, where she is revived, and once more joins her parents in their simple home. Length, 656 feet.

LOVE UNDER SPANISH SKIES.—Don Caesar de Castro was a young vagabond nobleman, whose gambling and fighting propensities caused him to be shunned by the majority of Spanish aristocrats and loved by the reckless plebeian blooded spirits who were wont to inhabit the inns and grog shops of old Madrid.

Near the city there lived a proud old nobleman with but one daughter, Dolores, his hope and pride, whom he wished to unite in marriage to Don Sallust, a most powerful and influential potenate, whose estates were of the finest ot all Spain.

Now, Dolores despised her father's choice and rebelled at an alliance so distasteful to her, partly because she did not love the man, but mostly because her heart was given to another, and that other no less a person than the reckless Don Caesar, the hero of our story. On her way to the Cathedral she had by chance met Don Caesar. They looked into each other's eyes and it was love at first sight.

One day while driving along an ancient street of the city Dolores was thrilled by the sight of her hero, who single-handed was defending with his sword a poor flower girl who had been set upon and insulted by a crowd of young ruffians. Complimenting him on his bravery and receiving in return a rose which the grateful flower girl had pressed into his hands, Dolores drove on, leaving our hero gazing after the fast disappearing carriage, his heart throbbing with mingled regret and delight.

But the secret of their love was not long to remain hidden from the proud father of our heroine. Don Sallust saw and divined the meaning of the glances that passed between the young couple, and hastening to Don de Sanchez acquainted that irate old nobleman with his daughter's choice. Calling the senorita into his presence, Don de Sanchez angrily demands that she forswear all de Sanchez angrily demands that she forswear all thoughts of an alliance with Don Caesar and prepare to carry out his wishes in regard to her marriage with Don Sallust. But the daughter is not to be so easily driven. Penning a letter to her lover, she bids him come to her at once and save her from the fate that threatens. Don Caesar loses no time in reaching the castle, where, by means of a rope ladder secured by his inamorata, he scales the walls and clambers up the rugged sides of the tower to the window of his lady's chamber.

Leaving the two lovers alone for a moment, we return to the father and Don Sallust, who by accident learns of the presence in the castle of the hated Don Caesar. Hastening to his daughter's apartments, the lovers are surprised by the entrance of the two men and several servants of the castle. Sallust is disarmed and Don Caesar is out of the window and rapidly descending the rope ladder. Quickly recovering his sword Sallust staggers to the window to cut loose the strands of rope, thus precipitating our hero to the ground below, but Dolores with an agonizing scream seizes a huge candelabra, and with the fierceness of a tigress battling for her own brings its whole weight down upon the head of Sallust, thus putting him hors de combat and saving her lover's life.

Sallust in a daze struggles to his feet, and enraged beyond measure at his rival's escape screams out to the amazed servants the offer of an immense reward for Don Caesar's capture, dead or alive. Instantly the guards of the castle prepare to give pursuit, while De Sanchez in a fearful rage orders his daughter's imprisonment in a wing of the castle overlooking a huge moat.

But what of our hero? Springing to his horse he gallops away and does not draw rein until he reaches an old monastery, where one of the monks who loves the daring youth, conceals him in the cellar until his pursuers, who have traced him there, have made their search and departed.

"Now will I rescue my adored one from her prison walls," shouted the triumphant youth as he dashed away to carry out his desperate plan of action. Gathering a half dozen dare-devil swashbucklers about him and overpowering the surprised guard, Don Caesar quickly led his supporters through the halls of the castle. Overpowering the servants they encounter, who rush toward them and attempt to block their passage, the stormers succeeded in finding the chamber of Sallust. Battering down the door, they rush in and drag the terror-stricken nobleman from his bed, threatening to take his life unless he disclosed the whereabouts of the fair prisoner. Sallust yields to their demands and tremblingly leads the way to the door, behind which languishes the beautiful Dolores. A few blows from a heavy hammer and the door flies open. The delighted girl throws herself into the arms of her preserver and is borne away just in time to escape the guards of the now thoroughly aroused castle. A messenger is sent ahead to the monastery to prepare the monks for the arrival and marriage of the young couple. After the ceremony one of the monks is sent to inform Don de Sanchez of his daughter's marriage, and obtain, if possible, his forgiveness. At first the enraged old nobleman refuses to consider such a proposal, but later secretly admiring the pluck and bravery of his new son-in-law, relents and grants pardon to the happy couple.

A large fete is arranged in honor of his daughter's alliance and when the handsome couple arrive in a coach and four, there was no prouder noble in all the land than Don de Sanchez.

A HOME AT LAST.—The story opens in the bedchamber of a young couple, where their little girl lies critically ill. The old doctor sits intently watching the child's face; the parents are near at hand, as is also a trained nurse. After a few moments the physician bends forward, feels the little one's pulse, then nods for the nurse to come to him. To her he tells that the child is dead and bids her break the sad news to the parents. The father, although grief-stricken, controls his feelings, but his wife seems dazed, as though scarcely realizing her bereavement. After a lapse of six months, we find the mother crazed over the loss of her child. The doctor, who has carefully watched her actions, tells the husband that the only thing which can bring about a change is to adopt a child about the same age and size of their own little one. Following the advice, the gentleman visits an orphan asylum. With an attendant, he and his wife pass about, watching the different groups of children. The husband seems to take great interest, while the wife is totally indifferent. A little girl is finally selected, all go to the office, where the necessary papers are signed and the little child is taken to her new home. Here she is given new clothes and playthings and is supremely happy, but that the mother cannot forget her own child and acts toward the little one almost rudely. The turning point comes when the adopted girl arranges a birthday party and invites her new parents to come to her room. The man heartily appreciates this act of childish love; his wife is only mechanically polite at first, then, her reason returning, she clasps the little one fondly to her heart. Length, 700 feet.

A CURE FOR RHEUMATISM.—In the hotel parlor old Fudge is seated reading and nursing his rheumatic foot. He finally spies an article in the paper telling of a wonderful cure for his ailment, "The Bee Sting" remedy, and immediately makes up his mind to get some. Going to his room, he calls a bell-boy, gives him money and the address and bids him hurry back. The boy goes to the drug store, buys a bottle and returns quickly to the hotel. By this time Mrs. Fudge has retired. Fudge opens the bottle and the bees swarm out and begin operations on both the man and his wife. They fight them off as best they can, then try to run away. Through the halls and into the parlor they rush, the bees following and stinging everybody with whom they come in contact. Our final scene shows Fudge and his wife with swollen faces and bandaged hands, trying to eat their dinner. Length, 275 feet.

A FRIEND IN THE ENEMY'S CAMP.—A woodman and his wife are seen working about their hut, their little daughter of about 12 years helping. The mother gives the child a couple of aprons and tells her to wash them in a stream nearby. The child does as she is bidden, and, after finishing, notices flowers growing nearby. She starts picking them and wanders off further and further from home. Two Indians are seen approaching in a canoe further down the stream. They finally reach the spot where the little child stands, spring out and bear her off down the stream. They reach camp with their captive, where the little girl finds a friend in a young Indian girl about her own age. Meanwhile, at home, the child is missed and the father starts out in the direction of the stream. On the banks he finds evidence of a struggle, loads his gun and paddles down the river. At the camp, the Indians retire and the little Indian girl tells the captive in pantomime that she will help her to escape. Watching their chance, the little girls creep from the teepee and walk toward the stream. They presently spy the woodman and the child is soon restored to her parents. A noise is heard and the Indians rush upon and attack the woodman. Escape seems hopeless when the wife appears, musket in hand, and puts the Indians to flight. Length, 520 feet.

A BRAVE IRISH LASS: The Story of an Eviction in Ireland.—Pat O'Malley and his wife Bridget are celebrating their golden wedding. The neighbors call in, congratulate the old couple, each one bringing a gift to commemorate the occasion. Among the visitors is Sir Thomas Gifford, a rich land owner. The old couple bid him welcome, offer him a glass of wine, which he drinks to their health, then takes a paper from his pocket, which gives them free use of his house as long as they live. They are profuse in their thanks, and, after shaking hands again, Sir Thomas departs. A young Irish girl among the number takes the paper, reads it to O'Malley, then places it in the cupboard for safekeeping. Black Dinny, a process server, looks through the window, sees where the paper is secreted and, when the coast is clear, enters the room, gets the precious document and goes out. A young lad appears at this time, sees Dinny, and, knowing his character, is sure he is there for no good, so kicks him out. The young girl runs in as McShane, a gentlemanly-looking villain, stands in the doorway and tries to make himself agreeable. His advances are repulsed and McShane is given the same treatment as Dinny, administered by the same Irish lad. Down the lane the two victims meet, compare notes and plan vengeance. Dinny shows McShane the paper which he has stolen; the latter sends him for the bailiffs and decides to evict the old couple. On the lawn in front of the cabin, O'Mally and his wife are watching the young people dance. Everybody is having a good time until Dinny, McShane and the bailiffs appear. McShane demands rent of O'Mally or threatens to put him out. The young girl steps forward and tells that Sir Thomas has given them free rent as long as they live, goes inside for the paper, returns quickly and tells them it is missing. The bailiffs start removing things from the house, and, while this is going on, the young girl rushes to Sir Thomas' home and tells him what is happening. He starts back with her, and, as they come in sight of the house, Dinny tries to sneak away, but the young lad grabs him, finds the paper and hands it to Sir Thomas. The latter acknowledges it and orders the furniture put back in the house. The crowd grab Dinny and beat him unmercifully, pelt him with stones as he runs away. Then the dancing is resumed. Length, 435 feet.

CHILDREN OF THE PLAINS: An Episode of the Pioneer Days.—An immigrant train is seen wending its way over the plains. The party consists of a mother and her two little girls, one four years, the other two or three years older; the driver and scout riding in advance and a guard of two or three plainsmen. After they have passed a certain point an Indian comes from a place of concealment mounts his horse and rides off to the Indian encampment, where he tells of the palefaces; then all mount and start in pursuit. The wagon train stops and is making camp as an Army scout bearing despatches comes up and tells that Indians are on their trail. He promises to send aid from the fort as quickly as possible and preparations for a barricade are at once begun. In a short time the Indians appear and surround the caravan. A brief fight ensues and all save the two girls are despatched. One is left for dead while the other is taken away by the warriors. Shortly after the soldiers appear, but too late. The little child is observed and after a short time revives and is taken by the commanding officer to the military post, where she becomes the pet of the regiment. Twelve years later we find the same young lady galloping over the plains. An Indian comes upon her, delivers a message, which alters her course and eventually leads to her capture. In the Indian village to which she is taken, she is selected by one of the braves for his quaw. The woman who is left to guard her observes a locket on her neck and by it recognizes in her her long lost sister. They decide to escape, cut a slit in the back of the tent and start for the military post. The escape is shortly after detected by the Indians, but too late to prevent the girls from reaching the fort. The young lady is welcomed by her soldier lover, to whom she presents her sister. Length, 555 feet.

LOST IN A FOLDING BED.—A man searching for a furnished room observes a sign on a house and rings the door bell. A woman answers, her little child tagging behind. The man is shown the room, in which there is a folding bed. The woman lowers it down, and, while her prospective boarder is haggling over the price, the child jumps on the bed and it closes up, locking her inside. No arrangement can be made. The man leaves the house, and, in coming down the steps, is accosted by another man carrying a bag. It contains a dog, which the owner wishes to rid himself of, and offers a dollar, which is readily accepted. As the man starts on his way an old woman looks after his suspiciously, runs into the furnished room house, where the mother is busy sewing. The old lady tells her story and an immediate search is made for the child. Not being able to find the child, the two women start for the police station and an officer is sent to assist them. The man with the bag is soon sighted and a chase follows, in which the officer finally catches up with the supposed kidnapper. The bag is opened and a dog falls out. The crowd, which has been attracted, laughs at the cop, who walks off in disgust. The officer and women return to the house and the policeman looks about, goes into the bedroom, lets down the folding bed and finds the lost youngster. The mother hugs her child for a moment, then turns her across her knee and administers a good spanking.

Bust the Trust

Read and think

How easily the exhibitor was bluffed into believing he could not run his theater if he didn't hook up with the TRUST. Yes, not only the exhibitor, but the film exchange as well, believed the TRUST had the game all sewed up in a sack; but when it came to the TRUST answering your questions, all they had to say after ten days was that they were swamped with correspondence and would advise you later; this gave them sufficient leeway. But what have they done? Trust film exchanges are violating their contracts. Why? Because they have to or go out of business.

How many trust film exchanges will there be in the next six months? IT IS GENERALLY BELIEVED FROM GOOD AUTHORITY THAT THREE TRUST FILM EXCHANGES WILL BE ENOUGH FOR CHICAGO and vicinity. What will this do to you, Mr. Exhibitor? Think it over.

In six months the Trust Film Exchange will not have a reel of his own fit to send out; the TRUST takes their films away, and all that is left for him to do is to get a job in a grocery.

All these things taken into consideration set us to thinking, and the more we thought, the more we looked like a lot of d—— fools.

Now, right here, the sooner you get to thinking and break away from the TRUST, the sooner you will know the great advantages of being independent. Every true American wants INDEPENDENCE; it's a FREE COUNTRY, so why not take advantage of the benefits of going independent WHILE THE IRON IS HOT.

Now, then, Friend Exhibitor, if you will go to the trouble of looking into this matter and try our you can bank on not being any the worse off, and you won't be in the clutches of a Strong Arm Holdup Gang—the TRUST.

Films furnished by the International Projecting and Producing Company are considered by authority at least equal to, if not Superior to, the trust makes.

"The independent film renter is scouting like mad for second-hand films. This is proof enough that the average independent does not intend to become a regular purchaser of the regular weekly output of the independent manufacturer, but intends to buy only when it suits him. This tendency in itself means failure for any concerted independent movement, and the Moving Picture Patents Company knows this and therefore they can afford to smile at the grandiloquent promises made by the Independents and the fierce threats made against the Trust. The simple, solid truth is that the vast number of exchanges that claim to be independent are running on the mangiest of junk and the outcry of their subscribers is painful. Already the business of many independent shows has been ruined and some of them are closing their doors."

The above paragraph appeared in the Moving Picture World on page 361, issue of March 27, 1909, under the caption of "Observations by Our Man About Town," and is the cause of our publishing the above offer. This paragraph was probably published with a view of ridiculing the INDEPENDENT movement and INDEPENDENT exchange. As this article has appeared, we wish to say, as America's Largest Film Exchange, either TRUST or INDEPENDENT, that the facts published are, in the main, true. There are many small wild-cat exchanges representing themselves as being Independent which are really the back door of some TRUST film exchange who are endeavoring to make their "junk" film earn them something.

In securing INDEPENDENT service, Mr. Exhibitor, you want to be sure that you are dealing with an exchange that is INDEPENDENT and buying INDEPENDENT film, and not endeavoring to palm off on you their old Trust "junk" film.

Editorial.

At a meeting of the Licensed Manufacturers in New York on Thursday experiments were conducted to decide upon the best method of illuminating the hall while the picture is being shown. It was found after several tests that the best effect was obtained by having green electric bulbs on the lights nearest to the screen and amber color on those farther back in the hall. Shading these so that the direct light did not strike the curtain, it was found that the light in the hall could be so strong that a newspaper could be read without detracting from the brilliancy of the picture. Some time ago we suggested to one theater manager a means of illumination which he adopted with most satisfactory results. It was to string three rows of lights across the ceiling, but shaded with V-shaped reflectors which deflected the light downwards, but kept the direct rays from reaching the screen and also from shining in the eyes of anyone in the audience. Shading the lights from the screen is not sufficient if the direct rays of the lamps strike the faces of the spectators, but it is surprising how much light may be deflected to the floor, where it is most needed, without affecting the picture on the screen.

The manufacturers expressed themselves as satisfied with the progress made by the Patents Company and approved the steps being made toward a better standing for the moving picture business. It was unanimously agreed to abide by the decisions of the Censorship Board and endeavor to make the service of national scope so as to prevent any action being taken by so-called police censorship, as has been done in some cities in the past.

The most important event of the week was the announcement from Carl Laemmle that he had decided to throw in his lot with the independents. Laemmle's office in Chicago and his many branches constitute such a factor in the rental field and his experience is so great that the step which he has taken after much deliberation can safely be taken as a strong commendation of the films that are being handled by the International Projecting and Producing Company. The heavy purchases from this new recruit will give a new color to the statement by Mr. Murdock that his company would be satisfied with one-third of the business.

Wanted: a New F. S. A.

It is three months since the Film Service Association was reduced to a state of masterly inactivity by the drastic action of some of those who had no further use for it and practically put it out of business. Since that time the Association, as we quite expected, has been quiescent. Whatever position it holds in esteem has certainly not been strengthened by the fact that its president has gone Independent. Some of the other officers of the Association can hardly be in sympathy with its negative policy. In other words, the Fim Service Association is like a house divided against itself and consequently must fall, even if it has not already done so.

Not that the need of a representative Film Service Association for the whole United States has passed away. On the contrary, the events of the past two months have shown very clearly that there is more need than ever for such a body to look out for the interests of those engaged in the film business. It is a fact, and in many respects a deplorable one, that at this moment there is not in existence in this country a single body which can fairly claim to be representative of any one section of the film industry. Some of the manufacturers are, it is true, united; here and there throughout the country there are State Associations of exhibitors; but the film renters, except insofar as we have pointed out, are uncombined. Now, we believe, in respect of the renters, that this state of affairs can be quickly remedied, if only a few energetic men, who have the best interest of the business at heart, will get together and reform the F. S. A. on broad, democratic lines and make it representative of the whole country. If this be not done, then the renter will surely find himself between the devil and the deep sea. For it is within the sphere of practical politics that he can be squeezed right out of business, unless he has some reserve of power to fall back upon. He may not be always able to rely on the assistance of independent importers to go to his aid in times of crisis.

It will be interesting to our readers to learn that the film situation in England is practically the counterpart of that which exists in America. The formation of the trust has brought about the growth of an independent section of the trade, and this again has resulted in the establishment of a Kinematographic Trade Production Society, which has been formed to safeguard the interests of all showmen, exhibitors and the trade generally. Its aim is to secure the free and unrestricted continuation of the kinematographic business. All interested are welcomed as members. It is supported by leading exhibitors, showmen, anti-trust manufacturers. The president, vice-president, council, secretary are prominent men in the British film trade, and we know sufficient of them to be sure that this society will carry out the objects for which it has been formed and will defend the rights of its members and freedom of trade.

Surely the American film industry will not lag behind its British competition in asserting its right to exist, to act on behalf of and for its members, and generally to carry out all those things which it is desirable to be done in furthering the objects of such an Association. The time is ripe for the re-formation of the F. S. A., and we suggest that steps to that end be taken right now, instead of waiting until the meeting in Atlantic City next July. We believe if the President took action in the matter he would find himself supported by renters all over the country.

Fire Insurance for Exhibitors.

Last week we briefly announced that the Motion Picture Patents Company had been instrumental in securing a reasonable rate of accidental insurance for licensed exhibitors and renters. Now we learn that by special arrangement with one of the most substantial fire insurance companies of this city the company offers fire insurance that will cover all of the furnishings and fittings, including the machine and film of a licensed theater.

This proposition of fire insurance, as well as liability insurance, is made possible only by the co-operation which the Patents Company has been able to bring about and some corresponding unity of action. Its success will depend upon the number of those who, we believe, will take advantage of either one or both.

If the exhibitor does not desire to cover himself with liability insurance as well as fire insurance, he can take either one, but the acceptance of either or both is essential to carry through this rate. The minimum premium for the first $1,000 will be $35. All over that will be written at 3 per cent. on the excess. The insurance is issued only to licensees, and upon the cancellation of license by the Patents Company the premium paid will be returned pro rata, less 25 per cent.

The offer is made through Mingle & Wood, 165 Broadway, who will issue the certificate upon receiving application. Licensed exhibitors will no doubt highly appreciate this convenience and the moderate terms upon which this insurance can be obtained.

It will be seen from various communications that we have published that the Patents Company is making substantial progress in its policy of materially advantaging the moving picture industry, or that large section of it which is affiliated with the company. Cheap accidental and fire insurance are distinct material benefits, the value of which are obvious. Moreover the information about the progress of the censorship shows that the company is accomplishing good and solid work in this respect, which is bound to exert a most beneficial effect throughout the moving picture field of the United States. Its association with the Liberal Sunday League in supplying educative matter about the liberal observance of the Sabbath is also worthy of commendation.

The Kalem Stock Company, which have been operating in Florida for several months, has now returned and been disbanded. Another company is being organized to operate in a different section of the country.

W. N. Selig writes from Denver that the country around there is under two feet of snow. So we may look forward to seeing some dramas with a real Winter setting and all the natural Wild West effects which are common now to the Selig productions.

The Goldstein Bros. Amusement Company, operating theaters in Westfield, Mass.; Exeter, N. H.; Westerly, R. I., will open a moving picture theater called the Pictorial Subway at 231 Main street, Springfield, Mass., seating about 350. Opening day May 30. Place to cost about $5,000.

The Modern Way in Moving Picture Making.

By Thomas Bedding, F. R. P. S.

CHAPTER VI.

The Camera.

I am anxious in these chapters to avoid covering ground occupied by the two excellent series of articles for operators and others, by F. H. Richardson, one of which has already appeared in the World, whilst the other started last week. If, therefore, it should seem that there are some practical departments of moving picture making that are not dealt with here, the reader will find them referred to in the chapters on "Plain Talks to Theater Managers and Operators" now appearing. Moreover, I am wishful to strictly confine myself to the results of my own observation and experience.

The taking camera is, of course, an important item in the outfit and whatever type is chosen—for obvious reasons I am unable to discuss the comparative advantages of different types—it should be the best for practical work. The first lesson to be got by heart is that of absolute cleanliness. Before exposure a film should be perfectly clean and free of all particles of dust and other foreign matter. The interior of the camera should be always carefully cleaned and dusted before use and the working parts kept similarly clean, so that no dirty matter is present between the sensitive film and the lens at the moment of exposure. This may seem somewhat unnecessary advice, but it is not so. It is surprising, indeed, how little attention is paid to such a simple matter and how many defects in the negative or positive can be traced to lack of cleanliness and the deleterious influence of ommipresent dust.

After exposure the utmost care should also be taken to guard the exposed film from rough handling, unnecessary abrasions and contact with dust. Often when I have been watching the progress of a sensitive film from its packing tin through the camera into the receptacle that holds it prior to development, I have been amazed at the carelessness of those who handled it. They seem to regard the film as if it was a piece of iron or wood, or some other article, the surfaces of which it was not necessary to protect. It cannot be too clearly pointed out that even the minutest defect on the film when magnified on the screen shows very, very largely, hence again the importance of an almost ideal cleanliness in handling the film in the operations before development.

Here a note may be given as to the surrounding cleanliness, and the safety of the non-actinic light, of the darkroom, in which the film is placed in the camera. Too much care cannot be taken in these regards. The darkroom should be spotlessly clean and the light so safe that no risk of fogging is run. Again, I have observed much carelessness in these respects, and that is why I draw attention to them. A light may be visually quite safe, it may not even actually fog a film, and yet, perhaps, it is not quite safe enough to prevent some sort of slight veiling appearing to degrade the purity of the negative. I wish some of my readers could see for themselves the very scrupulous care which is taken in some sensitive paper and film manufactories to guard those tender surfaces from the action of dirt and too much light. I wish, indeed, that the moving picture maker, who too often is only an intelligent empiric, could have such an experience, then he would realize for himself the necessity of being as careful in these little details as the manufacturers themselves. It is too often the case that those who make moving pictures are ignorant of the requirements of successful optical projection. They seem indifferent to the fact that more care is required in the manipulation of moving pictures than is the case with stationary pictures and enlargements. From the latter, minute defects can be easily spotted out. In moving pictures, when once the positive is made some defects are almost irremediable, consequently there is all the more need for prevention. With some of those defects and the remedies for them, however, I shall take occasion to deal with in future further chapters. The object of the present one is to emphasize the need of preventing purely mechanical defects—mechanical defects which arise from carelessness, uncleanliness and, if I may say so, the baneful use of tobacco in the work rooms. Smoking should be strictly prohibited whenever a sensitive film is being handled. This recommendation will not conduce to my popularity; but I would like to say that I am an inveterate smoker myself and drop the habit when handling sensitive films.

In the next articles I shall treat of the developing rooms; developing; and the chemical operations of moving picture making.

The New Copyright Law.

The film duper must end or mend his wicked ways by July 1st next, on which date the new copyright law, recently passed, comes into effect. We recommend all interested in the protection of copyrighted moving picture films to procure a copy of this act from the Government Printing Office at Washington. A perusal of the act clearly shows that moving picture films are protectable under two heads—one, under "dramatic compositions," and two, under "photographs"—and that they enjoy the same benefits of copyright as books, periodicals, musical compositions, works of art, reproductions, etc. The act seems to us to be clearly drawn and to give adequate remedies for infringements. An important section of the act provides for means whereby a film may be publicly declared to be copyrighted. The notice may "consist of the letter C enclosed within a circle, accompanied by the initials, monogram, mark or symbol of the copyright proprietor; provided, that on some accessible portion of such copies or of the margin, back, permanent base or pedestal, or of the substance on which such copies shall be mounted, his name shall appear."

Now it seems to us that these provisions entirely cut the ground from under the feet of the film duper or pirate, as the duping or piracy is at once made manifest by a reproduction of the fatal C in a circle, which we assume all film makers will in future put on their films. In the case of the piracy of a dramatic work, such as a film may be copyrighted, the penalty is $100 for the first and $50 for every subsequent infringement. A newspaper reproduction of a photograph can be penalized for from between $50 to $200. It is, therefore, a moot point as to which course a complainant for infringement may take, but it seems pretty clear, however, that adequate protection is given. As we have already said, a copy of the new act should be in the possession of those who are interested in the copyrighting of films.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

By F. H. Richardson, Chicago.

CHAPTER II.

In handling steam we use the term "pound' to denote pressure. In handling water its volume or quantity is expressed in "gallons."

Electricity has pressure just exactly as has steam in a boiler, but this pressure is expressed in "volts" instead of, as in steam, in pounds. Electric current has volume, or quantity, just as has flowing water, and this quantity is measured, or expressed, in "amperes," instead of in gallons, as is the case with water.

Fix it firmly in your mind that the term "VOLT" MEANS PRESSURE and nothing else but pressure, just exactly as pounds means pressure in a water pipe or a steam boiler, and that "AMPERES" MEANS VOLUME, OR QUANTITY, of current flowing, exactly as gallons would mean the quantity of water flowing in a water pipe. Let me impress upon you that it is of importance to your clear understanding that you get it thoroughly squared around in your mind that electric current has both pressure and volume, exactly the same as has water in a watermain, and that the terms volt and ampere mean in electrical practice precisely the same thing as do pounds and gallons when applied to a watermain carrying water under pressure.

The "ohm" is the term used to express resistance to the passage of an electric current. Current in passing through a wire meets with resistance, just as a water pipe offers resistance to the flow of water through friction. This resistance is expressed in ohms.

The term "Watt" is used to measure the amount of work performed by an electric current. In other words, it means electro-motive force or horsepower. Merely for the sake of convenience the term "kilo-watt" is much used, meaning 1,000 watts. A watt is 1/746 of a horsepower.

DEFINITIONS OF TERMS.

These definitions are the clearest, simplest the writer has been able to discover after a search of many standard works on electricity. He believes that a close inspection of them will enable the average man to arrive at a pretty close understanding of what the terms really mean. At any rate they cannot be put in simpler language.

VOLT: The practical unit of electric pressure, or electromotive force. The pressure required to move one ampere against a resistance of one ohm. The electro-motive force induced in a conductor, usually an armature coil, which is cutting 100,000,000 magnetic lines (of force) per second.

AMPERE: The unit of electric current (quantity or volume). That amount of current which can be driven by a pressure of one volt, the unit of electric pressure or electromotive force, through one ohm, the unit of electric resistance. Such a rate of flow of electricity as would transmit one coulomb per second (a coulomb is defined as the unit of electrical quantity. That quantity of current which would pass in one second through a resistance of one ohm, under a pressure of one volt.). A current of such strength as would deposit .005084 grains of copper per second. The unit rate of flow per second.

[NOTE.—Some writers say that the term ampere does not represent quantity, but only indicates the strength of the current; quantity being represented in coulombs, which means the quantity passing a point in a given time (coulombs equal the amperes times and seconds). This is splitting hairs altogether too fine for the average operator. Technically the above statement is quite true, but for the operator's purpose it is well enough to say that amperes represents quantity.]

OHM (there are several st andards, viz., the Board of Trade Ohm, English Ohm, British Association Ohm, Legal Ohm and the Standard Ohm): The "Legal" ohm is the standard used in the United States, and it is defined as follows: The resistance of a column of mercury (the resistance such a body of mercury would offer to current) 106 centimeters in length, having an area of cross-section of one square millimeter at 0 degrees Centigrade or 32 degrees Fahrenheit. This is now the international value of the ohm.

WATT: The unit of electrical activity or power. The number of watts is numerically equal to the amperes times the voltage. One volt times one ampere equals one watt or 1/746 horsepower. Sometimes called the "Volt-Ampere."

HOW TO MAKE CALCULATIONS.

Knowing the voltage and number of ohms resistance the number of amperes flowing may be determined by dividing the volts by the ohms; as, for instance, having 110 volts pressure and a rheostat offering 3 ohms resistance how many amperes will we get? 110 divided by 3 equals 36 2/3, the number of amperes. Knowing the voltage and number of amperes flowing the ohmr resistance offered may be determined by dividing the volts by the amperes; as, for instance, with 220 volts pressure and 40 amperes flowing how many ohms resistance have we? 220 divided by 40 equals 5½, the ohms resistance offered to current passage. Knowing the number of amperes flowing and the ohms resistance we may find the voltage by multiplying the amperes by the ohms; as, for instance, if we had 3 ohms resistance and were getting 30 amperes of current we would find the pressure by multiplying 30 by 3, which would tell us the voltage was 90.

RULE OF THUMB.

The following formula, known as the "Rule of Thumb," is correct and is very convenient in aid of memory. In this formula I let V equal volts, A amperes and O ohms. Remembering that it is expressed as a fraction and that the line means "divided by" and that with the upper quantity eliminated the two lower should be multiplied together, just cover up the quantity desired and what remains will equal the quantity covered up. For instance: I wish to ascertain the resistance, knowing the amperage and voltage. I place my thumb over the "O" and see that V divided by A will give it.

To find the watts being consumed you simply multiply the voltage by the number of amperes flowing; as, for instance, we have 30 amperes at 110 volts. How many watts? 110 multiplied by 30 equals 3,300 watts. How many kilowatts is that? 3,300 divided by 1,000 euals 3 3/10 kilowatts. How many horsepower is it? One watt is 1/746 of a horsepower, therefore 3,300 watts would equal 3,300 divided by 746 or 4 and 158/373 horsepower.

INSULATION.

This is a matter of the UTMOST IMPORTANCE to which too little attention is usually paid. In too many instances current bills are excessive simply for the reason that there are unsuspected current leakages due to faulty insulation. By this it is not necessarily meant that the wire covering is faulty. Insulation, in its true sense, means keeping the current from contact with the ground, in any degree, at all points.

The earth is the great storage reservoir of electricity, being, it is supposed, filled with electricity at what might be termed zero voltage, even as the ocean is filled with water at no artificial pressure.

When electricity is under pressure its constant endeavor is to escape from the wires into the earth, just exactly as the endeavor of steam confined under pressure is to escape into the air. What the air is to steam the ground is to the electric current. Both lose their pressure by escaping, one into the air, the other into the earth.

We confine the steam with metal plates and rivets, and the higher the pressure the stronger and heavier must these plates and rivets be.

We confine electricity to the wires by insulation, and the higher the pressure (voltage) the more perfect must be the insulation. If there be a small "pin-hole" in the seam of a boiler the steam will still be confined at pressure but some of it will be escaping, thus causing constant waste. If there be a slight imperfect "ground" (imperfect connection between the earth and the wire) there will be a small but constant current leakage, which will tell in the meter and therefore in the current bill. You will thus readily see the necessity for very carefully insulating your wires. Further along I will tell you how to detect grounds.

Air is a conductor of electricity, but a very poor one. It will only carry current at enormous voltage—far in excess of anything used commercially, with the single exception of wireless telegraphy. Air may, therefore, be said, so far as commercial electric current be concerned, to be an absolute non-conductor, and it follows that current cannot escape from the wires by way of the air. Certain substances, such as rubber, glass, porcelain and others, are non-conductors of electricity, and by stringing the wires through the air, allowing them to come in contact with nothing but non-conducting material, the current is confined to the wire, just as is the steam in a boiler by its steel plates and rivets. Wires are usually covered with rubber or some non-conducting composition, thus still further insuring complete insulation and consequent confinement of the current.

But if there be the very least metallic or other current-carrying connection with the earth there will be current constantly escaping from the lines, and this means waste pure and simple. It is the small "ground" (a "ground" is a current-carrying connection between the wires and the earth) that is dangerous to the pocketbook. If connection is such as to carry considerable current it will most likely manifest itself by heating, and may burn off, but the small ground is different, for you can't see it, you don't have any visible evidence that it is there; no one but the meter knows it exists, but all the same it works night and day. The power-house man may know of it through his ground detector, but he won't send any special messengers to tell you, since it is constantly adding to his "bills collectible."

Be very careful, therefore, to have your insulation PERFECT.

Supposedly, in this day of multiplicity of electrical devices, nearly every one understands what a "short circuit," familiarly known among electricians as a "short," is. Nevertheless I will explain the matter. As has been stated, the constant tendency of current is to lower its own pressure, just as steam seeks the open air for the same purpose. The positive wire of a circuit carries the full dynamo pressure, but the pressure of the negative wire is very much less. Current will therefore flow from the positive to the negative the instant any sort of current-carrying connection is established. A lamp is a limited short circuit between the positive and negative, limited because of its internal resistance which is calculated carefully to only allow a certain quantity of current passage. A projection arc lamp is a dead short circuit when the carbons are closed, but the short is controlled by the resistance device (rheostat or compensator) placed in series with it. The true "short," however, is where the two wires of the circuit become joined through contact without any such controlling device. Such a short may be by reason of the two wires coming in direct contact, in which case the fuses will blow or the wires heat and probably burn off. Fuses are supposed to, and by all means should, be small enough to blow the instant such a short is established, otherwise there is danger of the heated wires causing fire. A short may be caused by a loose wire swinging against the opposite conductor or being carelessly thrown across the two. It may be caused by some poor conductor being laid across the two wires, in which case there will be current leakage until it is removed, and this leakage will represent the same waste as would a ground. As a general proposition, however, a short shows itself immediately and whatever damage is done is almost instantaneous.

THE KALEM COMPANY'S NEW HOME.

The new offices and factory of the Kalem Company in the Kodak Building, on West Twenty-third street, are now almost completed and they expect to be settled down in their new abode by May 1. The factory layout is a model of neatness and efficiency, and, as new machinery is being installed, we can look forward to seeing Kalem films of even better technical quality than in the past, although they have already earned a high reputation in this respect.

Chelsea 223 is the new 'phone number of the Kalem Company.

THE BAUSCH & LOMB PROJECTION LENSES.

In the little catalogue of projection lenses sent us by the Bausch & Lomb Optical Company, of Rochester, N. Y., the moving picture man will find a lot of information that will teach him how to show good pictures on the screen. The first nine pages of the book are devoted to the optics of the subject, and these are described in such simple terms that any operator of ordinary intelligence can understand them. Another six pages are specially devoted to the various types of projection lenses, which are deservedly popular amongst moving picture operators. We note, too, that the list contains particulars of stereopticons of various forms, dissolvers, etc. This little catalogue should be in the possession of every moving picture man, whom we recommend to send to Bausch & Lomb Optical Company, of Rochester, N. Y., for a copy.

ALL ADVERTISING COPY MUST BE IN HAND BY WEDNESDAY TO APPEAR IN THAT WEEK'S ISSUE.

OBSERVATIONS BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

Many who are keeping a close watch upon events in moving picture circles, more especially those who are with the Independents, think they have detected a sign of weakness on the part of the Motion Picture Patents Company. This belief is based upon a modification of the rules applying to the payment of the license fee the company exacts from the exhibitors who hire films from the exchanges that operate under the company's contract. After May 3 the license fees will be paid by the exchanges and they will secure reimbursement by adding $2 per week to the bills of the exhibitors. Heretofore the Patents Company has sternly enforced the rule that any exchange furnishing films to an exhibitor who could not show a license or a receipt showing payment of the fee for one rendered itself liable to a fine fixed by the Board of Directors of the Patents Company after a hearing. Several exchanges suffered the penalty and, I understand, that in subsequently avoiding an infringement of the rule and requiring customers to produce a license or receipt they lost some business.

Looking at the matter from an unbiased point of view the modification of the rule that gave the exchange men no alternative can hardly be called a sign of weakness. The Patents Company loses nothing by it. It really gains, and in this way: It will be remembered that when the company first announced the levying of the license fee it declared that as soon as affairs could be systematized there would be a scale of fees ranging from 50 cents to $2 per week, according to the size of and business done by the various exhibiting places. With the approach of the first of each month the announcement of such a scale has been looked for, but it seems now to be indefinitely postponed. The notice regarding the royalty is clear. The instructions to the film exchanges are: "On and after Monday, May 3, 1909, include in each of your bills for weekly service to exhibitors an item of $2 for exhibitor's royalty in advance for the current week."

There certainly does not seem to be any weakness about this. It is a practical notice that no graduated table of license fees has been arranged and that a uniform fee of $2 per week is to be collected. It also notifies the exchanges to get busy and turn into the Patents Company treasury on Tuesday of each week the fee due from each exhibitor. The exchanges are made the collection agencies for the Patent Company, and if the collections are not made the exchanges, and not the exhibitors, will have to furnish explanations.

While some may construe this latest move on the part of the Patents Company as an imposition on the exchanges, those in touch with the latter must know that it is something most of the exchanges have been striving for since the royalty was first imposed, and it is a relief to the exchanges to be allowed to collect the royalty, as the new rule provides. It is well known that from the start certain exhibitors have been unqualifiedly opposed to paying any fee directly to the Patents Company. It has been a matter of principle with them. Hundreds of them have offered to pay a sum equal to the amount of the royalty to the exchanges, but not one cent would they pay direct. It is also well known that many exchanges adopted this course to hold their trade, but they would not do it in all cases for the reason that they were uncertain as to how long certain customers would stay with them, and, consequently, did not wish to run the risk of being out of pocket a month's royalty. Now that the Patents Company has agreed to accept payment in weekly installments the exchange man is on easy street. The exhibitor can still maintain his theory of principle and add $2 per week to what he pays for film service and the exchange can pay the royalty without fear that some other exchange will get the benefit of his outlay for two or three weeks.

In due time many other modifications by the Patents Company will follow, and the outlook for the film exchanges will be much brighter than it has been for the past eight or ten weeks. The truth of the matter is that the Patents Company when it first started out knew practically nothing of the film renting and exhibiting business, but by frequent consultations with the manufacturers and renters its working force is gradually becoming educated, as it were, and all signs point to an ultimate formation of a more practical system than has marked its operations.

Day after day as I make tours of the nickelodeons the proprietors keep firing at me such questions as: "Well, has the Legislature done anything yet?" "Are we to be closed up next Sunday?" "Has the court decided that case yet?" etc. etc. I thought I put it pretty plain in one of my recent letters that if such inquiring exhibitors would join the association that has been formed to advance and protect their interests they would always be kept fully and authoritively informed on all such topics. A statement made by an exhibitor during the past week fits in here very nicely. He said: "Too many exhibitors are asleep, while the clergy and others who have been attacking the picture shows are always wide awake and on the job. They are the first on deck and always out in force before either the Mayors, Board of Aldermen, the Legislatures, or the courts, while the exhibitors stand idly by and leave the other side of the fight to proportionately a few men." There is considerable truth in that.

Several exhibitors were complaining the past week that two or three issues of licensed films did not reflect much credit on the makers because the subjects were practically a rehashing of some produced several months ago by their fellow-makers. One of them, "My Friend, Mr. Dummy," was easily recognized as following, in idea, "My Friend, the Dummy." While the story was different the subject as a whole was so closely identical with the original production that it was looked upon as a repeater by those who did not know it was a new production, and several exhibitors felt a little sore about it. These manufacturers must know that there is no law to compel them to turn out two, three or a half dozen subjects a week and that it is suicide for them to attempt to do so when facilities or ideas are against them. True, the exchanges want to meet the demands of the exhibitors and therefore count upon the manufacturers to furnish them with the material to enable them to do it, but if that material is not what it should be somebody is going to suffer. The lines of originality and novelty must be adhered to. Exhibitors won't stand for old ideas in altered form. They can get the old films at cheaper prices if the business is to have a backward trend. The manufacturers frequently tell us that one of the most difficult features of the business is the securing of an adequate supply of suitable ideas for subjects. In view of the enormous amount of subjects that have already been produced and the vast scope they have covered this complaint is justifiable—but only to an extent. The manufacturers are not willing to pay an adequate price for ideas. Bright men with brilliant ideas are waiting for a chance to unload sufficient manuscripts to keep all the manufacturers supplied with material for months, but they will not unload at the prices offered. Many writers have stated that they would and could fill the bill and would like to become identified with that branch of work, but they look for more than nominal compensation for their labor.

Reviewing trade conditions of the past week as relating to the manufacturers and renters they appear to be at a standstill. Developments indicate neither a decline nor an increase of business in either quarter and the Summer season is fast drawing near, so that no improvement is looked for. This is the forecast based on experience in past years. There may be a change this year. It all depends upon whether or not the "first run" fever is going to strike the country and seaside resorts. In former years the demand for new subjects dropped with the closing of exhibition places in the cities and towns. Old films were good enough for the Summer dates. Perhaps this rule will not work during the coming Summer. Let us hope it will not, for the sake of the people who need the money. Yet I have heard several renters say that the Summer resorts are counted upon by them as an outlet for the films with which they become loaded during the Winter. Every dollar the old films make is a dollar to the good, and more can be made out of them by renting to the Summer resorts at reduced rates than having them lie idle on the shelves. So you see the moving picture business is such a peculiar one that each case seems to have its individual conditions. "Why," said a renter to me the other day, "the old stuff is good enough for me during the Summer. First run is out of question in that season. Who is going to pay for it? Anybody who puts first run by the sad sea waves or under the tent by the babbling brook is going to walk home at the end of the first week and seriously impair his credit."

OLIVER.

MOTION PICTURE PATENTS COMPANY

THEIR POLICY AND PROCEDURE.

Hearing so many complaints from licensed exhibitors and exchanges as to the inactivity of the Patents Company, we called upon the general manager and found anything but inactivity prevailing. "Those kickers," Mr. Macdonald said, "seem to take it for granted that our work was to stamp out all their opposition. What we are doing is more important for the betterment of everyone in this business. We have influenced favorable legislation. We are working for an open Sunday. We have succeeded in getting a low rate of fire and accident insurance. We have discussed with Mayor McClellan his supposed opposition to moving picture shows and pinned him down to three objections: First, the censorship, which is now being handled satisfactorily to all concerned; second, the safety equipment, which his own men will supervise; third, the question of darkened halls, which we have experimented with and find to be unnecessary. We have more than doubled our facilities for supervising the use of our licensed films and the restrictions applying to them will be rigorously enforced. Our publicity department has caused much helpful references to moving pictures to be inserted in the daily papers, and this is only a few of the things we are doing in behalf of the exhibitor and exchanges and which is of more importance than fighting petty squabbles."

This is so, and we noted the general activity and assure our readers that the Patents Company is a factor that will more and more be felt in the field. We understand that the legal department is not lax and that proceedings are now being instigated against infringers of their patent rights and violators of their license agreements.

FIRE INSURANCE.

By special arrangement made with one of the most substantial fire insurance companies in this city, authorized to do business all over the United States, the Patents Company offer fire insurance which will cover all of the furnishings and fittings, including the machine and film of your theater.

This proposition of fire insurance, as well as liability insurance, is made possible only by the co-operation which the Patents Company has been able to bring about and the corresponding unity of action. Its success will depend upon the number of those which we believe will take advantage of either one or both.

If the exhibitor does not desire to cover himself with liability insurance as well as fire insurance he can take either one, but the acceptance of either or both is essential to carry through this rate. The minimum premium for the first $1,000 will be $35. All over that will be written at $30 per $1,000, or 3 per cent. on the excess. The insurance is issued only to licensees, and upon the cancellation of license by the Patents Company the premium paid will be returned pro rata, less 25 per cent.

The offer is made through Mingle & Wood, 165 Broadway, who will issue the certificate upon receiving application.

THE PATENTS COMPANY AND THE LIBERAL SUNDAY LEAGUE.

The Patents Company has received a letter from Prof. Ernest Richard, of Columbia University, stating that over 40,000 American citizens of the German-American Alliance would support the movement of the Liberal Sunday League. "I can likewise assure you of the sympathy and best wishes of a million and a half of citizens scattered over 40 States, who form the National German-American Alliance incorporated by act of Congress."

The Patents Company is associated with Gen. John T. Cuttting, August Belmont, Alfred G. Vanderbilt, Edward Lauterbach, Samuel Untermeyer, Robert C. Kammerer, Hon. Antonio Zucca, J. H. L. Curtis-Lithchild and other prominent business and professional men who form the Liberal Sunday League, and at the mass meeting in Carnegie Hall on Saturday, April 24, will furnish motion pictures showing how Sunday is observed in various parts of Europe.

THE PROGRESS OF THE CENSORSHIP.

We are informed that the Board of Censorship keeps up its work two days a week at the offices of the Motion Picture Patents Company. Almost a hundred thousand feet of films have been examined to date and only 420 feet have been rejected. At the last meeting, held on April 12, 28 subjects were criticised and only ten feet censored. This shows that the manufacturers have fallen into line and are anxious to produce only pictures that are clean and wholesome. As a matter of record, the nine licensed manufacturers even before the institution of the Censorship Board turned out scarcely any offensive, the case being then, as it is now, a simple one of demand and supply. As soon as the censors cut out a bit of film the manufacturers study the discarded portion and make notes in order to prevent similar mistakes in the future, and as soon as they are able to learn exactly what is desired there is nothing but that kind produced, and the Board of Censorship will go out of existence for lack of work. At the rate the films are being examined and released it will be but a short time when the supply of the entire country will be of the "approved" order and the people who patronize the motion picture theater may do so without fear of shock to their sensibilities.

Replevin Actions.—The Patents Company has doubled its force of detectives in order to carry out its purpose of preventing unlicensed theaters from using licensed films. One of the most notable replevin actions of the week took place on the evening of April 13 when a representative of the Patents Company and a city marshal visited a theater run by Wifbalen, at 407 Eighth avenue. One Vitagraph film, entitled "The Inauguration of Taft," and one Pathe, "Laplanders," were seized.

CARL LAEMMLE INTERVIEWED.

By Our Chicago Representative.

"It was surely a surprise to me to see you turn Independent, Mr. Laemmle."

"Well, I tell you, here's the whole matter in a nut-shell. I was simply compelled to do it in order to keep good faith with the exhibitors. You ought to have seen the letters I have been getting ever since I joined the Patents Company. Why, the exhibitors even accused me of being a party to something that was not exactly right."

"Have you made up your mind that you will be able to take care of the exhibitors?"

"Well I should say so. I didn't take this step without considering it. I have laid awake nights, and I have been trying to figure out which way to turn. I have watched the Independent films that have been issued and I know that I can take care of the exhibitors using my service better than ever. Look at the advantage! They have seen Association stuff for the past few years. Now I have got a chance to show them something they haven't seen before. Fresh stuff, new stuff, different faces, different actions, better and cleaner, and all approved by a Board of Censors, etc. I have waited three long months for the Motion Picture Patents Company to do something, but they were too busy collecting the $2 a week royalty, and in the meantime the exhibitor in the small town was suffering. It hurt like the deuce to see some of my old time friends and customers fall in line with the Independents. They didn't do so right off the reel. No, they stood for the first $10 all right, and when the second raise of $6 came I again explained to them that the Motion Picture Patents Company had been so busy that they were not able to adjust this license fee pro rata. Then, when I just got through explaining to the exhibitors, out comes a bulletin from the Patents Company asking for $8.50 more, covering the month of April. That was the limit."

"Will you take your supply from now on from the International Projecting and Producing Company?"

"Yes, sir, I will. I have seen the stuff and I have convinced myself that they are all there with the goods."

"Do you think you are going to import goods yourself?"

"Import goods? I don't know. I feel sure that Mr. Murdock has made all the arrangements; in fact, I have seen with my own eyes the class of goods he is receiving from the other side. I have seen contracts he has made with the leading manufacturers, and I am frank with you. I tell you that lots of their stuff is far superior to anything I have ever seen."

"What effect do you think this move of yours will have on your business?"

"I was never more confident in all my life that I am going to make a clean sweep."

"What really caused you to go Independent?"

"There is only one explanation I can offer. The exhibitors throughout the country that stuck to my banner through thick and thin were losing faith in me. The Motion Picture Patents Company promised to elevate the business, promising to give protection to the little fellow in the small town. They promised everything on earth to make things better, and what have they done? Nothing. Is that right? Well, I tell you, I could dwell on the subject for days and weeks, but you see how busy I am. It was a wise move on my part, because this week is starting busier than ever, and assurances are pouring in from friends, customers and exhibitors throughout the country congratulating me upon the stand I have taken and assuring me of their co-operation."

WEEKLY COMMENTS ON THE SHOWS.

By Our Own Critic.

The Cooper Union is hardly a "show" within the meaning of this department of the "World"; nevertheless, it comes sufficiently near the description to answer my purpose. That purpose, the reader has been told more than once, is twofold. Firstly, to criticise the pictures from their photographic and dramatic standpoint, and secondly, to study the effect which the pictures have upon the various audiences. Hence it will be seen that the Cooper Union is, as they say in England, "a place within the meaning of the act." On Monday evening last there was a public meeting held at the Cooper Union under the auspices of the Censorship Board, whose work has recently attracted so much attention in these pages, and forming, as I did, one of the thousand or more persons who attended, I was able yet once again to get an idea as to the attitude of the public towards the moving picture.

The audience consisted, it seemed, of persons drawn from the working classes, with a considerable leavening of young people. There were several speeches made by Mr. Collier and others, explanatory of the need of the recently formed Censorship Board, and although I am cynic enough to think that such a Board is not assured of any considerable longevity, yet I feel that Mr. Collier and his associates made out an excellent case for its formation. I also gathered there was a disposition in certain quarters to provide "sauce for the goose as well as the gander"; in other words, it is felt that this outbreak of censoring should not stop at the moving picture show, but should take in the more pretentious entertainments on the "Great White Way." If Mr. Collier and his associates bring pressure to bear on the purveyors of histrionic salacity between Twenty-third street and Columbus Circle, they will deserve well of their fellow-citizens.

The speeches were of a familiar type and simply brought out the fact that both the "Trust" and Independent manufacturers were quite agreeable to have their pictures censored and that the scheme was working very well.

During the intermission some pictures were shown. These included the Great Northern "William Tell" and "Copenhagen Zoo," also a kidnapping picture by the Edison Company and an iron foundry scene by Pathe. The large meeting greeted these and other moving picture photographs with every manifestation of pleasure. It was apparent to me that there was a widespread realization, not only of the interest and beauty of the moving picture as it is known to-day, but also in its enormous possibilities. Possibilities that have been outlined in these pages, and in these pages only, during the past few months.

Decidedly the meeting at the Cooper Union made a very material contribution towards the elevation of the moving picture in public esteem.

NOTES OF THE TRADE.

A. C. Hayman has sold out his interest in the Actograph Company and will probably open a licensed exchange in some other section of the country.

The J. N. S. Co., 311 Superior street, Toledo, Ohio (formerly B. L. James, Chicago), have a fine equipment and are prepared to turn out 200 titles per day. They are also making some very nice leader announcements, such as "Ladies will please remove their hats," etc. See their advt. on another page.

The Cincinnati Film Exchange has leased the entire building located at 214-216 West Fifth street, Cincinnati, Ohio, from the Nicholas J. Walsh Distilling Company, to carry on their business. They now occupy the entire third floor of the building, but owing to the fact that their business has increased to such proportions, it was necessary for them to secure the entire building to carry on their business properly. The Cincinnati Film Exchange gave the successful meeting at the Lyric Theater on March 18, since which meeting their business has grown wonderfully.

Some Notable Films

"Wilbur Wright's Aeroplane" is a film that will be issued by Pathe Freres on April 30. It is a remarkably successful photographic rendering of the flights of this world-famous aeronaut and will create great interest. Exhibitors who advertise it as a feature will draw to their shows a class of people who are rare frequenters of these places.

The Great Northern Company's "Copenhagen Zoo."—In the current annals of the moving picture it would appear that manufacturers lay themselves out occasionally to make an extra effort to produce a picture which shall stand out by itself above the general average of their productions, however high that may be. Some instances of what we mean will occur to our readers. For example, the Pathe film, "The Assassination of the Duke of Guise"; the Vitagraph "Napoleon," and others that will rise to memory. They are in the nature of special productions and possibly indicate a level of excellence to which, in course of time, all the work will subscribe. Meanwhile, they must be regarded as special things of their kind, involving much extra labor and cost, perhaps, and not by themselves recouping the manufacturers for the outlay.

But it is all a good and wholesome sign, which we think it our duty to encourage, and therefore, in this weekly series of articles under the above heading, we shall make a point of singling out for special reference any one film which, in our judgment, merits the distinction of separate lengthy treatment. In our pages last week there is one such subject mentioned. This week we have been impressed by an imported film of the Great Northern Company, called the "Copenhagen Zoo." This is a picture which merits close notice, first of all on account of a technical innovation. It is double tinted; that is to say, two tints, greenish and brownish, are neatly used so as to give it a pleasing color effect. Thus the characteristic tint of water is accurately represented; while, as our readers know, the brownish tint may be distributed over a picture so as to produce naturalness of effect. Anyhow, the appearance of the picture so treated is distinctly pleasing.

Now, the study of animals is always a fascinating one with the camera. In stationary photography the entire animal kingdom has been laid under contribution for subjects, as we well know. Indeed, we ourselves have found much congenial "food for the camera" amongst the brutes of creation. Very little, however, has been done in making moving pictures of animals, etc., although in Europe, Oliver Pike, the brothers Kearton, and some American workers have done work of the kind, of which the general public knows little. Hence in introducing this film the Great Northern Company have to some extent broken new ground and the result is that the picture which we saw this week is a distinct success. It pleases young and old, is really educational, and, strange to say, is cleanly amusing; for you get much amusement out of studying the ways and manners of animals. This picture gives, as it were, a panoramic view of a well-stocked zoological park. There are the walrus, monkeys, the gentle hippopotamus, the lordly lion, the Polar bear, both in water and on land, and so on right throughout the little kingdom of these imprisoned creatures. The photographer, whoever he may have been, seems to have carefully studied their characteristic attitudes, and endeavored to portray the individual idiosyncrasies of each animal, and the result is that as one sits and looks at this film and the animals in their natural movements, if artificial environment, one is conscious of getting a very good object lesson in the habits and foibles of the interesting creatures that go to make up the "lower" kingdom of nature.

We think that this picture, which is a very beautiful piece of photographic work, is clearly the outcome of much intimate animal knowledge and will be a success wherever it is shown, for it appeals to all classes of human animals. It tells its own story simply and clearly and is a step in the right direction of the really educative, for it interests while it teaches without preaching, and therefore it produces on the mind an agreeable impression of easily assimilated knowledge. We think the Great Northern Company deserve every encouragement in this branch of their work. At a special exhibition of censored film given to the public in Cooper Union Hall on Tuesday evening, no film received more flattering remarks than this one of the "Copenhagen Zoo." The film will be released within the next ten days

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

The haughty Sicilian prince who, in the elegant tonsorial palace of the Cavaliere Zanetti, on Fourth avenue, periodically works on my hair and face, is a careful reader of The World. His comments on its contents are pointed but illuminating. Says he: "Gee whiz, I lik-a to see the renter man who would make me pay two dollars a-weeka license to picture trust. No, sir, not for mine-a. Why they want it, eh?" I explain that the money so collected is devoted by benevolent persons towards the uplift of the moving picture industry, legislatively, publicly, privately and otherwise. To which the haughty prince retorts by digging the razor viciously into my damask cheek and remarking: "Yah! I do my own uplift-a. Don't forget it-a, Mister Lups Graphimus."

Vincent—that's the prince's name—is all for freedom, every time, all the time, above and below. "Ze censor man-a, and the women-a! Yah! What they know of censor-ing? Your true arteeste sees not wrong in ze human form; it is good; it is made by God; if it is bad then God is bad to make it so. In old Rome the toga wirilis was short-a; it reach only to the knee. But in New York-a—bah! Ze censors and ze ministers would not have it so because they are ignorant, blind, do not know. They would put corsets on Venus de Milo, and sheat' gown on Diana coming back from chase." I explain to Vincent that other times induce other manners, but this fails to pacify him. He will not be comforted; he is persuaded that Mr. Collier and his friends are not "arteests."

Vincent is apprehensive, too, lest the clarification of the moving picture drama by the 80 Fifth avenue and People's Institute reformers should emasculate it down to insipidity. "For the mollycoddle I have-a no use; no use. I like my meat strong-a. Otello for mine-a. In Otello, you will remember, the jealous man smothers the bad wife. It is classic; it is tragic; it is grand. Would your censor man cut out the grand, the tragic, the classic from the moving picture? If so, then I do not want to see them. I am not-a school children. I am a man, with man's passions. Julius Caesar, too. The Romans—him they killed. Your censors—they will not 'low murder in moving picture of to-day. Why? It takes place; why not show it?"

I assured Vincent there was sound reasoning in what he said. This week Mr. Mantell is playing the gory "Julius Caesar" at the Academy of Music. Over the way at the Unique under the new censorship a film of the same subject would not be admissible. Bit inconsistent, is it not? "The sight to do ill deeds makes ill deeds done," whether they are shown on a screen or acted on a stage. That the censors find it difficult to draw the line is proved by the fact that the other night Mr. Collier declared they had agreed to pass a "Kidnapping" film. I should not be surprised if these well meaning persons found that they were occasionally contradicting themselves. Vincent, in his wisdom, has put his finger on the weak spot of the scheme.

There are two bills before the New York State Legislature prohibiting the production of immoral plays. Upon this the New York Dramatic Mirror remarks: "Public opinion—not individual opinion—is the safeguard of public morality as anything in the theater or elsewhere may affect that morality. And there are plenty of laws already on the books to back up public opinion." Exactly what The Moving Picture World has been saying all through the piece. So far the censorship has worked smoothly enough, but with the progress of the moving picture play I foresee trouble. The film makers will claim the same liberty as the theatrical managers; and if they don't get it they'll break away from the association.

For instance, the next film d'art of Pathe's is "La Tosca." I'm just wondering what the censors will say to it, and if they turn it down what Messrs. Pathe will do. I know what I should do. I'd turn down the censors. "La Tosca" is one of Victorien Sardou's masterpieces in which Sarah Bernhardt made, perhaps, her greatest triumph. It is a story of love, hatred, jealousy, revenge and murder. The scene where the woman places lighted candles around the body of her murdered lover is weird and thrilling to a degree. Will the censors stand for it? I hope they won't for then we shall know where we are. Also will they stand for Maeterlinck's "Monna Vanna" when it comes along, as it surely will.

SHAKING DOWN THE SONG WRITERS.

And Incidentally Plugging for Certain Slide Makers.

The moving picture operators and singers in the five and ten cent moving picture theaters, since the traffic in licenses has been stopped, have discovered another way to add to their salaries, and incidentally give their business a bad reputation. The insolence with which they make their demands and the information that they are union operators and singers adds to the presumption that they can make a man pay them for their influence in getting a song sung before the public.

A song writer, or more properly a lyric writer, who has been collaborating with Miss Henrietta Markstein, one of New York's most artistic pianists, started out a few days ago to get the songs, which bore Miss Markstein's name as the writer of the music, sung in the theaters. The songs had been tried out by a number of severe critics and pronounced as strictly first-class. He was armed with two beautiful sets of slides made by one of New York's best known slide makers.

The first place he went to was a moving picture theater above Harlem Bridge. The singer there, a young lady, was willing to put his song and slides on for him, but the operator —more properly the crank-turner of the moving picture machine—absolutely refused to run the slides. The operator asked:

"Who made your slides?"

The song writer told him.

"Punk, punk," said the crank-turner, and then added: "Why didn't you go to ——— ——— to have your slides made. He makes the best slides ever."

All this time the crank-turner had not seen the slides. He then intimated that he might consent to run the slides if a little remembrance was given him.

The next place the song writer struck was a place on 116th street and Lenox avenue. He left the slides there with the singer and three days later he met the proprietor on the street, who told him to come for his slides, saying that nobody could get their songs sung in his place unless they paid him.

At another place in Harlem the young lady singer returned the song to him, saying that she absolutely could not memorize it and that her mother had compelled her to lay it to one side.

The song writer asked her how much it would cost him to have her memorize it, and she smilingly said that she would put it on for five dollars. He told her that was what he thought and that she couldn't sing well enough to make her efforts worth five dollars.

His next experience was at the Harlem Opera House, where he says a fellow who was singing there very stiffly told him that he would put his songs on for $25, but finally agreed to do it for $15 and to see that they were sung in the other theaters of the circuit.

His next experience was at a moving picture show on the west side of Eighth avenue, near Twenty-fourth street. The young lady pianist here is very bad, yet she condemned Miss Henrietta Markstein's music and with the singer told the song writer that his songs were the "punkiest kind of punk." Of course, they did not know who Henrietta Markstein was any more than they knew Verdi. The singer also condemned the slides and asked the song writer who "de guy wuz dat made dem slides?" Then he handed the slides back to the song writer, who, having tied a peculiar knot on the box, knew it had not been opened.

This singer also asked the writer why he didn't go to a certain slide maker to have his slides made instead of "gittin' dem made by an amatoor."

So the song writer went back to his slide maker. He told about his reception and he was frankly told that the whole thing had been an attempt to shake him down and see if he had any coin in his pockets. And that is all it was.

There have been many complaints made of this business of singers, piano players and operators working the shake-down game, and it is only just that they should be exposed. But the business of these same people making a deliberate attempt to injure a slide manufacturer's business and plug for another man is new and dangerous. Not only dangerous to the man whom they try to plug for—as it smacks of the bribe—but dangerous to themselves, as when they join in decrying one man's goods and recommend another's it makes a partnership—or more properly a conspiracy—to injure another man's business. And it is dangerous to their employer, as it makes enemies for him of men he must have as friends.

The slide maker, however, whose goods were decried dismissed the whole matter with a "Pshaw," and laughed when he was describing the occurrence to the representative of the Moving Picture World. He said: "I am known all over the world for my slides. I have never cut the price to get trade and I have never had any complaints from any customers except those who were up to some dishonest trick. The competition of people who go around bribing moving picture operators and singers and piano players does not worry me in the least. Everybody finds his level, and the public will demand the work of the skilled slide makers—this is shown by the care with which the better class houses select their songs and slides.

NEW THEATER FOR THE BRONX.

A model fireproof moving picture theater is to be constructed on the north side of 149th street, near Third avenue, from plans drawn by George Keister for Samuel E. Jacobs, owner, 135 Broadway, corner Cedar street, who is building the theater as an investment and will lease the property improved. The theater will seat 400 on lower floor and 200 on balcony floor, and will have large exits and all improvements for safeguarding the public. We reproduce the architect's drawing of the front, which shows that the theater when completed will be among the most atractive of moving picture houses in Greater New York.

AMUSEMENT PALACE FOR PROVIDENCE.

A new motion picture house with a seating capacity of about twelve hundred will open soon in Providence, R. I., at 34 and 38 Richmond street. According to the plans now made by Mr. T. R. Bullock, the proprietor, it will be one of the finest in New England. The billiard and pool tables that formerly occupied the hall have been moved into new quarters and it will be the only building of its kind that has so many of the popular sports of the day under one roof—namely, billiards, pool, bowling, moving pictures, vaudeville and illustrated songs. It will be very unique in this way, as it will give our patrons a chance to bring their families to enjoy the theater while they are playing billiards or bowling. As all of the different entertainments are under one roof it does not make it necessary for anyone to leave the building to go from one entertainment to the other. The place will be known as Bullock's Temple of Amusement, the name that Mr. Bullock has used since he opened the place four years ago. Mr. R. B. Royce will have charge of the house and assist Mr. Bullock in the management and booking of the vaudeville. Mr. Royce is well known to the Summer park people and sends greeting to all of his friends. Bullock's Temple of Amusement Orchestra will furnish the music under the leadership of Mr. Geo. Wallace. Mr. Bullock has signed with the Motion Picture Patents Company, so that good pictures are assured. These will be changed on Mondays and Thursdays. It is expected that the house will open on May 11.

Reading, Pa.—The New Victor, at 748 Penn street, erected by Carr & Schad, the well-known amusement promoters, is without doubt the most commodious and artistic home for moving pictures in this city. They give a 50-minute show of pictures and songs—all of the latest. The following details of the construction may interest other exhibitors: The entrance is very artistic. Genuine Italian marble, standing 7½ feet, forms the base of the entrance's sides. Above this are mirrors, while overhead an old ivory effect is used to frame a beautiful panel full of cupids. The front is lighted with 300 tunstant lights, making it extremely attractive. The doors are glass, set in mahogany. Inside brass rails mark the exits and passage ways and also bar off the entering crowd from rushing into the seats. There is also a mirror here at which the women can adjust their hats. The interior is equally decorative with its yellow and dun effects. Electric lights set in frieze work add to the effect, especially a frame work setting off the canvas. Three hundred and ninety-nine leather upholstered seats make sitting a real comfort. A floor pitch of three-fourths to a foot enables you to see from all parts of the house. The ventilation scheme is excellent. A flue has been built at one end to create a draft. At the center is an exhaust fan capable of changing 40,000 cubic feet per minute, more than the place needs by far. In Summer the doors at the front will be opened and a fine draft created. The operating booth is entirely fireproof. It is set way up at the ceiling and is made of cement on an iron frame. Even the window frame is of iron. The wires are in conduits, the switches and reels in iron boxes. The booth's top opens on the roof and the operator in Summer can open all the top and be practically in the open air.

From Eberhard Schneider, 109 East Twelfth street, New York, we have received a batch of neatly printed catalogues of film developing and printing machinery, rheostats, slides, and of the Miror-Vitæ Projecting Machine, which is said to be flickerless and one of the most durable that is made.

The Eagle Film Exchange, of Philadelphia, are doing a thriving business and have opened a branch in Baltimore. Despite the rumors that the Independents are short of good stuff, the Eagle Film Exchange men can't see it that way and say that the great demand for the subjects, "William Tell," "The Last Days of Pompeii," "Nat Pinkerton," "Lost in the Snow," etc., prove that the exhibitors are appreciating the Independents' work. We did not notice any signs of gloom around this office.

Comments on Film Subjects.

"Festivals in Bankok."—A series of photographs of the King's Jubilee and typical scenes in Bankok. Special permission was granted the photographer of the Nordisk Films Company for this picture.

"The Artist's Dream."—A fantastic picture illustrating the power of money and the misfortunes of the gambler.

"The Magic Purse."—A pretty fairy tale of a young man who quarrels with his parents and his sweetheart and goes out into the country, where he falls asleep and dreams that mermaids and all manner of beautiful damsels are dancing attendance upon him. One presents him with a magic purse which is always full of money. On awakening he repents of his actions and a reunion follows.

"Story of a Calf's Head."—An Eclipse comic which has few elements of humor about it. There is a tangle of love and to get even the disappointed suitor changes the package of sweetmeats and the calf's head which the cook is taking home. Of course there is trouble, and when the suitor comes with the real sweetmeats he gets them thrown at his head. There is really more merriment shown in the picture than is developed in the average comic, but it doesn't always get a laugh from the audience.

"Policeman in Action."—A Gaumont comedy which kept the audience in fits of laughter. It is on the style of "Liquid Electricity," but introduces some new stunts that seem to take well with the public.

"The Winning Coat."—This is an elaborate film from the Biograph studio. The story is that a young man is disciplined for some real or fancied wrong to the king. While meditating over it he picks up the wrong coat and in the pocket finds a letter telling of a plot to kidnap the queen and hold her for ransom. He goes to the designated place at the hour named, secreets himself, and, as the plot is about to be carried out, manages to hold the kidnappers at bay until help arrives. The king forgives him, makes him a knight and gives him the sweetheart he wanted, who was one of the queen's ladies-in-waiting. It is a simple enough story, but the staging and costuming are superb. And in the hands of the capable actors employed by the Biograph people the play becomes decidedly distinctive. The photography is excellent and in every particular the picture is pleasing. It deserves a longer run than one day. The toning might be mentioned as adding especially to this picture, though it doesn't always do so.

"United By Misfortune."—This is an Independent film which has numerous elements of attractiveness, though it is of the depressing type. A father practically deserts his family for the drinking bout. His little girl is blinded by an explosion when building a fire and is taken to a hospital by a friendly tramp who is passing. The father goes to his work, which that day was trimming trees. He falls and is badly hurt and is taken to the hospital partially insensible and is placed in the cot next to that occupied by his daughter, whom he does not know has been blinded. The daughter recognizes his voice and tells of her misfortune. The last scene shows the family united, though with the child forever blind. The photography is good and the staging could scarcely be improved, but the story is not to be commended. It is too depressing. It doesn't amuse, and that should be the primary requisite of a motion picture.

"In the Limelight."—A Gaumont comedy which has some novel elements of fun in it. A street fakir has a machine which will show you what you desire to see. For example, a man wishes to know what his wife will be like and is shown and so on through a number of changes. The fun arises from the fact that the faces shown change constantly and the outlines of figures fade into faces, and vice versa. It is a very attractive film and far above the usual comedy. It is so different from anything hitherto brought out that it is certain to attract attention for a long time to come.

"Charlie Forced to Find a Job."—Charlie goes the limit and is turned out doors by his parents. They find him engaged in various menial occupations and he makes such a show of himself and of them that they finally beg him not to work any more. Some of the situations are amusing, but the Gaumonts have not kept up their usual standard in this picture.

"A Marriage of Convenience."—A Vitagraph drama which has much heart interest. A young artist falls in love with his model and they are to be married, when an uncle of the artist appears on the scene and declares that the young man must marry an heiress whom the uncle has found for him. Notwithstanding his promises to the model he does it. There are some strong scenes, notably the one where the model discovers the truth and slashes the picture of her he has been painting and the one where she gives way to her despair in her mean lodgings. She is last seen about to throw herself from the parapet of a roof. As the young couple leave the church after the ceremony an officer calls the bridegroom away, and here is defect. One may imagine that it is to see the dying model, who, perhaps, did throw herself from the roof, or one may imagine a dozen other things without knowing what is actually the reason. It would seem that this should be corrected. It leaves the story in a muddled state now, and unless this curious tangle is cleared up it seems incomplete. Perhaps this is the work of the censors, who have cut out the climax of the story.

"A Tax on Bachelors."—A comedy from the Vitagraph studio which shows what happened when a tax was placed upon bachelors. There was a proviso in the law that if the tax was not paid by a certain time the bachelor must marry whoever proposed to him first. The old maids' club held a meeting and decided that the bachelors should not pay the tax within the specified time. The bachelors decided they would and started in a body for the tax office with the old maids after them. Fortunately for the bachelors they won the race and the old maids fainted when their hopes were so ruthlessly dashed. It gets a good many laughs and has some really funny episodes.

"An Interrupted Joy Ride."—A comedy from the Edison house which attempts to be funny but fails in all except two situations. It is supposed to represent the difficulties which beset an automobilist who tries to run a machine when he doesn't know how. He has all sorts of trouble and finally is arrested and taken away by the police, sharing the fate of the chauffeur who was arrested for speeding earlier in the picture.

"The Other Fellow, or a Fight for Love."—Two fellows want the same girl and spend a considerable portion of their time fighting over her. It keeps their friends busy separating them. The film is chiefly interesting because of the lively mix-ups the young chaps have.

"Who Needed the Dough."—A Vitagraph comedy which has a bit of novelty in it. A tramp steals money from the hands of a man who is counting it. He takes refuge in a bakery and to save the money hides it in a batch of dough which lies on the moulding board. He goes out penniless and begs a nickle of a gentleman and buys a loaf of bread. Into that loaf has been moulded the money he left in the dough and he is rich again. It gets a hearty laugh.

"After Midnight, or the Burglar's Daughter."—A Vitagraph drama which shows a young woman saved from being run over by a gentleman. She proves to be a burglar's daughter and is an adept at the business herself. She is sent to break into a house and is horrified to discover that it is the house of the man who saved her. She begs for mercy and it would have been granted, but the gentleman's wife appears and, her suspicions being aroused, she secures the young woman's arrest. She serves two years in prison and is released at the instance of the gentleman and his wife. One cannot say much in commendation of this film. It has no particular point, and less interest. The situations do not seem entirely clear and the acting is certainly below the Vitagraph's usual standard.

"A Sound Sleeper."—A tramp sleeps, according to the Biograph funny man, through all sorts of disturbances, including being carted in a barrel to an ash dump and piled on the ash heap. It adds variety to a programme, but the humor is far fetched.

"The Curse of Gold."—A Lubin drama which is a tremendously strong arraignment of the love of money. The principal character is a miser who subordinates everything to his love for gold. He coerces the poor, he drives a young man nearly to suicide, and he refuses his own people the few little things they need. He keeps his money in a vault beneath his house. He enters it to put more money there and a huge beam falls across the heavy iron door, closing it completely. When he realizes his situation he empties his bags of precious gold in his frenzy, but to no purpose. Before him pass in grim procession the people he has wrung the money from and as the last one passes he falls insensible. It is a remarkably strong film, though of the depressing type.

"My Friend, Mr. Dummy."—A Lubin comic which gets some hearty laughs. A young man going home from his club discovers a dummy in front of a clothing store, which he appropriates and takes along with him. The things this couple do are extremely amusing and the audience is laughing all the time the picture is running.

"Pranks of a Mischievous Kid."—A Pathe film in which the pranks of a lively youngster are very attractively set forth. He gets a number of persons into trouble, but the film ends with him getting his deserts. The switch is being very vigorously applied to his anatomy. The film is lively and in places funny.

"Moonstruck."—A Pathe film illustrating the dreams of an inebriated Perriot. While it is not particularly funny, it is amusing. The Perriot cuts a humorous figure sailing through the air on a stove pipe on his way to the moon. Further it permits the Pathes to introduce that familiar ballet again, though it is unquestionably true that audiences are beginning to tire of that somewhat. Of course if one attends a show but seldom these wonder films with liberal sprinklings of ballets are not displeasing, but regular patrons become accustomed to them and would prefer a change. The film is technically as good as the Pathes' films usually are.

"The Rude Hostess."—Sometimes a simple subject can be made notable by the acting, and in this picture the Biograph actors have achieved a success which is all the more attractive because it is worked out of what might at first thought be deemed unpromising material. The story is simple enough. A gentleman burglar enters a house, opens a safe and extracts therefrom a quantity of valuables and falls asleep, or pretends to be asleep in an easy chair when he hears someone approaching. The woman who enters suspects that there is evidence of something besides a mistake, and manages to detain him until she can ring for assistance and have the police called. Her success in detaining him is one of the best pieces of acting seen in a motion picture in a long time. In fact, both the lady and the burglar are adepts and they do their parts admirably. After it is all over and the burglar has denounced her as a rude hostess as he is led away by the police she has hysterics. This might seem out of place, but it is another of those natural touches for which the Biograph people are notable. The picture is not long, but is admirable because of the excellence of the acting.

"Schneider's Anti-Noise Crusade."—A Biograph comedy which depicts Schneider after he has been invited to respond to the toast "The Ladies" and is endeavoring to prepare his speech. First a trombone in the hands of a husky boy disturbs him. Then it is his wife and her music master practicing on their violins. Next a phonograph breaks in upon him. He gets them all quieted after a time, including the parrot, which had been roused to frenzy by the torments of the boy. Just as he is getting to work burglars enter the house and steal all the musical instruments. Schneider discovers them, and when he finds that they are after the musical instruments he assists them to get away with their booty and even gives them money for taking the noise producing articles. Then he goes back to his speech in peace. It is a clean bit of comedy and is a welcome relief from some of the inane things that pass for comedy.

"Brother Against Brother."—War dramas are becoming popular and the latest from the Selig studio has much to commend it, both from a scenic and dramatic standpoint. The picture opens in a country village store in Kentucky and shows two brothers taking opposite sides in the conflict. Then follow numerous scenes of riding, battles and other war action, all of which are good and are reproduced with considerable fidelity to fact. One of the brothers, the Confederate, is chosen to go through the Union lines with a verbal message. He is captured and the colonel before whom he is taken proves to be his own brother. The spy is sentenced to death at sunrise and is imprisoned in the guardhouse. The brother enters and assists him to escape by exchanging coats and hats with him. A few weeks later the Confederate brother is killed in a charge on a bridge and dies in the Union man's arms. The closing scene is the same store with the widow and the child, and such of the villagers as happen to be present, listening to the story of the death of the Confederate. The battle scenes are realistic and the staging is liberal enough to make them seem actual conflicts, which is more than can be said of all attempts of this sort. The uniforming and other accessories seem to be as true to actual facts as they can be made now. Perhaps the most striking feature of the film is the picture of the sorrow of the women when the men departed for the war and the somber costuming after it closed which tell graphically the result of the strife. Sometimes it is well to stop and think and this picture will make one do it.

"Forecastle Tom."—A Lubin picture telling the story of a lifelong fidelity to a lover which is beautiful to see. Because of a thoughtless lovers' quarrel a man leaves his sweetheart and enlists in the navy. A message which she undertook to send to him never reached him. He consigned a bottle to the waves with a message for her which she received, but before he could return he was killed in an explosion on shipboard. Twenty years elapse and a picture full of tenderness and beauty is shown in which the girl, now grown gray, sits by the fire looking at his picture and reading again the last love note he ever wrote her. While the impression created is saddening, yet there is a suggested purity and strength which redeems it from being depressing. It is a picture which one would like to see more than once. The staging and technical quality are both good.

"Any Port in a Storm."—The Kalem Company has produced a trick film which has everybody guessing. A number of ne'er-do-wells start out to steal a farmer's chickens. He chases them with a gun and they all hide in a barrel. One after another the entire half dozen disappear in the barrel and remain until the farmer passes. Then one by one they come out. To prove that there is no trick about it, the last one turns the barrel upside down and sits on it. It is a very successful bit of comedy and the mystery surrounding the barrel trick is sufficient to increase the interest to the highest pitch.

"A Cup of Tea and She."—An Edison picture which is depressing, though perhaps its dramatic qualities are in a measure compensatory for that feature. A young man falls in love with an artist's model, but his parents object and the girl, to satisfy the man's mother, agrees to make him hate her, which she does by unseemly actions at a Bohemian gathering. The romance ended, a number of years elapse. The young man is seen in his office transacting business as a banker. As he goes out he opens the door of a cupboard and discloses the picture of the girl as she was when he fell in love with her years before. A scrub woman appears, who is seen to be the former artist's model. She opens the unlocked cupboard and sees the picture of herself. Then the banker returns to lock this cupboard. He sees the scrub woman, but does not recognize her, though she does him and almost makes herself known. But he rushes out and leaves her almost paralyzed with grief. The film ends here. Probably it is artistic and one can supply the rest as one's imagination may dictate, but it would leave a better impression if the film allowed them to come together after these years of separation. Technically the film is good, with the exception of a few places, where the photography is weak. The painted scenery waves in the wind in one or two places, but perhaps the casual observer would not notice that.

"The Northern Schoolmaster."—The Kalem film of this week is a true-to-the-life story of the scorn of the Southern gentleman for the negro and of their ill-treatment of a Northern schoolmaster who takes the part of one who is being persecuted. A fire in one of the Southern mansions and the heroic rescue of a young lady by the schoolmaster lets the people see what real courage is in him and they are quick to atone for their past misdeeds. The story is well told, with a little love episode to add interest, and introduces some splendid photography of Southern scenes.

"Confidence," a full reel Biograph subject, received uncommon applause at Keith's Bijou Dream. It is a story that will appeal to a high-class audience and the acting of the principal characters is perfect even to the minutest detail.

"Napoleon, the Man of Destiny," brought out the applause from a crowded Broadway showhouse. Several people in passing out asked when the film would be shown again. It was suggested to the manager that the film should be kept on for the rest of the week, but he launched forth against full reel subjects and said that what he wanted was short comedies so that the house could be emptied and filled more frequently. This is poor encouragement to the Vitagraph Company, or any other manufacturer for that matter, to go to great expense in staging a grand subject which requires a full reel to display.

"In the Days of Oliver Cromwell."—Another film d'art from the Pathe studio which deserves a long run. It is a series of incidents in the life of Cromwell which led up to the execution of King Charles I. The story of Cromwell is too familiar to require repeating, though the touch of romance given to it by the introduction of Cromwell's daughter in the service of the king adds to the interest. The king's defiance of Cromwell is good, while the appearance of Crom-

CHICAGO PIPE ORGAN CO., Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen:—I am pleased to say that the second organ installed by your company in the Princess Theatre, just opened by me in Peoria, Ill., is proving also a great success, showing that the people of the smaller cities appreciate its wonderfully sweet music as well as those of the larger ones. No one of the five acts receive the applause that our organ does. I am sure that if the theatre owners knew of the great success I am having on account of the organ, they would not delay in installing one. Yours truly, well's Ironsides is well simulated. It is undoubtedly true that the interest in the film lies rather in what it suggests than in what is really told. Like the Napoleon, which was noticed last week, the main incidents in the life of Cromwell are so well known that it is scarcely necessary to repeat them, and these pictures refresh one's memory and introduce Cromwell as he presumably was. The action of Cromwell is good, but there are weak spots in the action of the king, though, as a whole, there is little to criticise in either. When Cromwell's daughter dons the king's outer garments and allows herself to be taken for him the interest is intense. The death of the cavaliers to permit the king to escape is good. The execution is excellently managed. Much is left to the imagination. The former method of actually showing a severed head is omitted and just as the axe is raised the curtain falls. This is right. No more of those grewsome deeds or scenes should mar otherwise good pictures.

"The Specter."—A Pathe which ends without much point and has but little interest even in its best part. A shoemaker's apprentice becomes enamored of a girl whose station is far above his and she laughs at him, indicating that he is poor. He robs his employer, is caught in the act by the man himself and kills him in the struggle which follows. Ever after the young man is followed by the specter of the employer. The last appearance is on a wall on an embankment, over which the specter plunges. And the film ends right there, with the guilty young man in the road. It doesn't seem to tell the whole story, either. Further, the picture leaves the money in the hands of the girl, and nothing seems to happen to her.

"The Rube and the Bunco Men."—Here is some clever caricature from the Essanay studio. A rube and his wife, or sweetheart, land in the city and are immediately set upon by two bunco men. The first thing they do is to sell the rube a wagon and two horses for $25, allowing the rube to drive away with a rig that stood beside the street. Next they offer a house for a horse and wagon and $200, which the rube accepts. The troubles of the rube begin when the owner sends his butler out and rolls them both down the steps. There are numerous funny situations developed as the picture unfolds which cannot be described. It is a good bit of comedy and gives the Essanay funny man, Turpin, an opportunity to display his powers, which he does to good advantage.

"The Chaperone."—A comedy by the Essanay people which gets hearty applause. A father orders a young man out of the house who is calling on his daughter. The young man ascertains that the only objection to him is that the father insists a chaperone must be present. Accordingly he induces a friend to make up as a chaperone and accompany him to the young woman's home. The father immediately makes love to the chaperone and the latter induces him to sign a paper permitting the marriage of his daughter to her lover. When the father undertakes to kiss the supposed chaperone the wig comes off and the identity is disclosed. It is very funny and gets not only hearty laughs, but vigorous applause.

"Under Suspicion."—A Gaumont which shows to what extent little things will lead a jealous person. A mother and daughter are planning for the father's birthday and induce him to leave. He goes away wondering why they wish to get rid of him. They intend to give him a cane and the servant carelessly leaves it where the returning man finds it. His jealousy is aroused and it increases as he discovers evidences of cutting flowers and letter writing. But it is all happily cleared up when they present him with their birthday tokens. It is a touch of life which shows that a good many misunderstandings come about in substantially the same innocent way.

"Give Me a Light" is a burlesque or comedy from the Powhatan branch of the Film Import and Trading Company. Being that it is only the second production of this concern it should not be severely criticised. Highly creditable in some respects, especially in the photography and toning of some scenes, it at least shows an earnest effort to produce good work. The weakness is in the stage management and is especially noticeable in one scene where a bomb is exploded in a sitting-room without disarranging any of the articles of furniture, although it is supposed to blow a tramp through the roof. The story is weak and could be improved by a different ending, such as the tramp plucking the fuse from the bomb and saving the house, which, by the way, is carefully if miraculously preserved to do duty in the next film.

"Economy Arc"

A transforming device especially designed for alternatiug current arcs.

Runs Cool—Very little power is lost in device itself. Consequently not enough heat is given off to make booth uncomfortable.

Easily Regulated—Simple switch gives 30-40 or 50 amperes, according to density of film and distance from screen.

Absolutely Safe—No connections or switch contacts are exposed, thereby eliminating fire risk due to accidental short circuits. Lamp circuit is not directly connected to supply circuit. No danger from shocks

Economical—Saving in power varies from 65% to 90% when compared with a rheostat. Does not affect lights on the same circuit and is not open to objections from the central station.

We have a booklet which gives some decidedly interesting facts about the "Economy Arc"—particularly in regard to its economy.

I HAVE QUIT THE PATENTS COMPANY

Hereafter I will buy $1,000 worth of New Independent Films every day in the year and I have the privilege of selecting it Instead of buying on the "Standing Order" plan. Isn't it great!

Because the International Projecting and Producing Company has given me proof positive that it has the greatest selection of high class film subjects in the world! Isn't it bully!

After an investigation lasting more than eleven weeks, and investigation that has cost me thousands of dollars, I make the move which 90 per cent. of my customers have been urging me to make, I have notified the Moving Picture Patents company that I want no more of its films. If you care to know some of the reasons, read

MY LETTER TO THE PATENTS CO.:

MOTION PICTURE PATENTS CO.,
New York, N. Y. 80 Fifth Avenue.,

CHICAGO, April 12, 1909.

GENTLEMEN:—Having found by carefully compiled reports that my customers positively will not pay the license demanded by you, and taking into consideration your ultimatum that all customers who have not paid their license must be cut off, I herewith surrender my own license issued by your company and beg to notify you that I shall cease buying films from the manufacturers operating under your rules after April 26. Of course I would prefer to stop buying from you immediately, but I give you the two weeks' notice which you are entitled to if you wish to take advantage of it.

As you well know, this is the result of most careful and painstaking thought and consideration. While I have chafed under many of the arbitrary rules of your company, I have tried to abide by them until I reached my limit of endurance. My letters show that 90 per cent. of my customers (and all of my prospective customers) want me to be more independent that I can possibly be as long as I do business along the lines that you insist upon.

Your latest announcement that the renters shall collect license money from exhibitors, is, of course, absurd. It virtually is an attempt to turn my offices into collecting agencies and is altogether out of the question. I have too much respect for the exhibitors and too much [illegible] might arrive when I could prove that I had been in the right all along. But instead of showing a disposition to render assistance, your company has thrown every obstacle in my path until it has caused me to take this action. Your company has had a glorious opportunity to do the whole moving picture industry a world of good. For my part I honestly believed you would seize upon it, improve it to the extent of your ability and bring order out of chaos. But you have failed us—you have hurt the very renters whose patronage gave you your best support—you have treated the exhibitors without any consideration whatsoever.

I say this with the friendliest personal feelings toward the gentlemen associated with you. I long ago had time to cool off after some of the anger which you aroused by your methods. I say it without malice or petty spite—and merely as a plain, straightforward statement of cold facts.

I feel that you are entitled to the above explanation as a matter of business courtesy; otherwise would not go into detail on a subject which is, to say the least, disagreeable.

Very sincerely yours,

L H Registered.

Carl Laemmle

President, The Laemmle Film Service.

But there are other reasons for the change, most important of which is the fact that I can actually get better films and better subjects for you now than I ever could before. There was a time when this was not true—a time when the pictures produced by the Patent company were by far the best in the world. But that condition no longer exists. I have seen scores of the films, which I will hereafter rent to you, and they are marvels of perfection, marvels of photography, wonderful in comedy, drama and tragedy; astonishing in scenic effects and beauty. They are the kind of films I want for my own theatres, and that is a pretty severe test.

No More Licenses! No More Heartbreaks!

Nothing but a straight business proposition, the best of films, the most reliable service, and prices that are within your easy reach

Brooklyn, N. Y.—Plans are being filed for the erection of two new theaters in the Bay Ridge district of Brooklyn: (1) The Amphitheater Company's playhouse, which is to be built at Forty-ninth street, at a cost of $35,000. It will be devoted to moving pictures and vaudeville. (2) The Field's Theater, which is to be larger and more costly, will be erected at Sixtieth street and Third avenue.

Cameron, Mo.—Daniels & Ward have sold their moving picture theater, the Dreamland, to F. W. Giffert, of Tulsa, Okla.

Baltimore, Md.—The first Independent house on Baltimore street is the "Gem," at No. 714. John H. Heinz is the new proprietor, having bought it from W. G. Spurrier. Before making his choice of service, Mr. Heinz made a personal call on J. J. Murdock and satisfied himself that there would be a plentiful supply of good Independent film. Competition is so keen in this section that Mr. Heinz made a wise move in starting in with an exclusive service.

Savannah, Ga.—By the first of next month the city of Savannah will have two more moving picture houses. Frank and Hubert Bandy will put up in the next week or ten days an airdome. The house will hold from a thousand to fifteen hundred people. It will be located in the heart of the city and will run moving pictures and vaudeville. The prices will be 5 and 10 cents. Paul Conida, of this city, will soon put up over his confectionery store a roof garden. The store is on Bull street, one of Savannah's main streets, and will be known as the "Athenaeum." Mr. Conida, when seen, stated that he would run moving pictures and vaudeville, would charge an admission that would please all and would seat from two thousand to twenty-five hundred. The house will be opened by the first of May. The Orpheum Theater will put on during the coming month a roof garden; it will be placed on the buildings next to their theater. The Savannah Theater has been rented by Jake Wells, of Virginia, who will run vaudeville and moving pictures during the Summer months; the prices will be 5 and 10 cents. Hubert and Frank Bandy have sold out the Lyric Theater in Macon, Ga., to Dan Holt. Robert Sullivan, the efficient manager who went from Savannah there, has returned and will have charge of one of the airdomes that are being put up in the city.

Edmonton, Alberta, Canada.—Within eight months three moving picture shows have started up here. The oldest, the Bijou, is no doubt doing the largest business. A few weeks ago the Grand Theater, which formerly had been a vaudeville house, changed its front at a thousand dollars expense and runs straight pictures now. Last week, one afternoon the operator at Grand during matinee leaving lamp house door open, a spark from carbons dropped on a reel of film lying on stool and the operator became excited and carried reel down from operating room to the cellar, to reach water supply, he said. The fire department was called. Several hundred dollars damage to building. Grand has since reopened. The Nickelodeon claims to be paying expenses, too. The two vaudeville houses, Orpheum and Empire, run a reel of pictures on each program. The three moving picture shows run daily matinees and evenings, change twice a week, three reels and an illustrated song for ten cents. All houses report increasing business, as travel is beginning to come this way for the season. While competition is keen between the various houses, yet there exists a feeling of the best good-will between various proprietors and employees. As elsewhere in Canada, there are no Sunday shows at all. Picture shows pay a license of $100 yearly. Rents are high. Understand the Grand proprietor refused an offer to lease for $275 a month; seating capacity about 280. Population of Edmonton is about 22,000.

COMMENTS ON FILM SUBJECTS.

"The Interrupted Romance."—A Pathe comedy which illustrates some of the difficulties into which a young man fell who was trying to tell a girl how much he thought of her. It ended in his getting into so many fights that he was stripped nearly naked and anotheer fellow ran away with the girl. It is funny and the audience laughed vigorously at the ardent wooer's discomfiture.

"William Tell."—In this film the Great Northern people undertook an ambitious piece of work which they have carried out successfully. It may be questioned, however, whether the average audience understands who William Tell was, or what he is reputed to have done. The story is not in the late reading books, hence is not so well known to the present generation as it was to the older ones. The main features of the old story are reproduced with fidelity to the legend, but it is true that unless one is familiar with the story the picture would be practically meaningless. The sub-titles help, but they do not make it entirely clear. As a stimulator to memory and an encouragement to research the film has its uses. Technically it is up to the Great Northern's standard, only more so.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DON'T ALWAYS BLAME THE MACHINE.

Delphos, Ohio, April 6, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—I am using a remodeled Edison Exhibition machine (nearly all parts new), which at times drops pictures by the dozen, then steadies down and works fine for the rest of the subject, but always drops and steadies at the same places. I have had a number of years' experience, but never had the like happen before. A SUBSCRIBER.

[The trouble you complain of seems to be caused by irregular perforation in the film used and also by poor joints. The fact that the film is steady for a period would indicate that the mechanism is in good working order.—Ed.]

MR. SEELY, PLEASE EXPLAIN.

New York, April 9, 1909.

Moving Picture World,

Gentlemen—Will you be good enough to publish in your paper that a certain operator known as LeRoy Seely, who was employed by the Brooklyn Comedy, 194 Grand street, Brooklyn, has been entrusted with four reels of film, containing the following subjects: "Oh, Rats!" "Hard to Beat," "Ted and His Little Sister," "The Tramp," "At the Altar," "Turning Over a New Leaf," with which he has disappeared?

We feel that by publishing this case it will avoid the possibilities of his disposing of them to advantage and also discourage any future attempts of this kind.

Yours very truly,

THE GREATER NEW YORK FILM RENTAL CO.

P. S.—Mr. Seely's address was 4820 Fifth avenue, Brooklyn, and he is operating on card No. 1084. These reels were entrusted to him on Tuesday, April 6.

REMOVAL NOTICE.

Brooksville, Me., April 16, 1909.

On account of the fine quality and artistic coloring of our travelogues and lecture slides we have earned a well-deserved reputation, second to none, over the greater part of the United States and Canada. We are, on account of the reputation, receiving letters nearly every day from music publishers far and near asking us to illustrate songs for them. So great has become the demand that we have decided to move our business into a section of the country where natural scenery abounds—lakes, rivers, mountains, rustic bridges, forests, old mills and marine views—and make song illustrating another feature of our large and growing business.

The same careful and artistic work will be continued on our travel and announcement slides that has always existed. Our mail orders for special work will be filled as promptly in the future as in the past. If our slides have always pleased you, we aim to still please you more by giving you illustrations for your songs that will draw people into your houses instead of sending them out. In the future our address will be

THE NEW ENGLAND LANTERN SLIDE COMPANY,
BROOKSVILLE, MAINE.

Where we will be pleased to hear from all old friends and add new ones to our list. Very truly yours,

W. S. WALKER, Manager.

TRANSFORMER

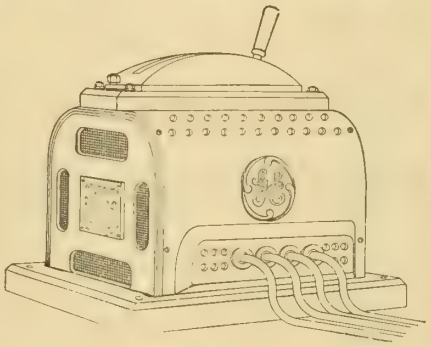
(Alternating Current)

SIMPLE COMPACT EFFICIENT

THIS TRANSFORMER, KNOWN AS "THE G. E. ECONOMY-ARC" mustof necessity be an invaluable adjunct to any alternating current moving picture installation. THE ADVANTAGES OF A TRANSFORMER FOR THIS WORK WILL BE APPRECIATED by both the theatre management and operator; BY THE MANAGEMENT in the reduction of light bills and in the better production of the pictures due to the steady light obtained, AND BY THE OPERATOR in the simplicity of the device, the absence of danger from shocks,, and the added comfort in the lamp house due to the low heating.



Price, $75.00

THE SAVING IN POWER INSURED BY THE USE OF A TRANSFORMER INSTEAD OF A RHEOSTAT VARIES FROM 65 to 90 per cent., depending upon the voltage from the supply mains. Many lighting companies require the use of 220 volts for moving picture work in order to avoid heavily loading one side of a three wire system. This increases the loss considerably in circuits using a resistance or reactive device for reducing the voltage.

Stories of the Films.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

A TROUBLESOME SATCHEL.—This comedy demonstrates the old maxim "a bad penny is always turning up," for it seems impossible for our friend Brown to get rid of the odious handbag. At a sale of unclaimed express packages the satchel looks good to Brown and he purchases it. Upon opening it he finds it contains a full set of burglar's tools. Well, here is a fine predicament for an honest man so he endeavors to get rid of it, leaving it behind him at several places, but it is always returned to him by some kindly disposed and well-meaning person. In desperation he seeks a secluded spot in the park intending to deposit it in the shrubbery. On the way he is followed by a couple of crooks who hold him up just as he is about to drop his "elephant." They take his money and valuables and also the satchel, which they open at once and learning its contents, immediately return his valuables and money—shaking his hand, with the expression, "Why, one of the Brotherhood." Length, 212 feet.

LADY HELEN'S ESCAPADE.—One of the most irksome conditions in life is to be in possession of everything one's heart may desire—and then some, for it is only life's struggle that makes it interesting. Prizes gained without effort are never valuable, and, though we don't appreciate it, the longing for something makes existence sweet; hence if one has everything there is nothing to long for. Such was the condition of Lady Helen, who had everything she could wish for, and in consequence felt very much bored. In her ennui she longs for excitement, for some new sensation, but in vain, until looking over the newspaper she is seized with an irresistible inclination of going out to work, so incognito engages as a domestic in a boarding house. Here she makes a ludicrous attempt to cook, etc., and of course, being totally ignorant of the culinary art, meets with meagre success. However, her pretty face and ill-concealed refinement make such a strong impression upon the male contingent, that they make no complaints at her cooking, and would have taken even poison if served by her fair hands. Two hallroom boys are particularly smitten. Among the boarders there is a talented musician, and his gentle manners and wonderful talent appeal strongly to Lady Helen. He on the other hand, not knowing of course her true self, falls in love with her. All this is most agreeable to the women folks, who at once conspire to rid the place of her, which one brings about by having her accused of the theft of the musician's violin. He, of course, believes her innocent, but she is discharged nevertheless. Lady Helen is so moved by the poor fellow's kindness, that she interests herself in his behalf and secures for him a position as a director at the Conservatory, for which he calls to thank her and finding her a lady of quality would shrink humbly from her presence, but she will not let him for she too loves him. The subject as a whole is a decidedly amusing comedy drama, with a pretty love story running through it. Length, 765 feet.

THE DRIVE FOR A LIFE.—A thrilling story of a woman's jealousy. It is said that jealousy is love, but it is not so; for though jealousy be produced by love as ashes are by fire, yet jealousy extinguishes love as ashes smother the flame, and an illustration of this is clearly shown in this Biograph subject. Harry Walker, a wealthy young business man, had been carrying on for some time a flirtation with Mme. Lebrun, a young widow, who, though he fancied as a friend, had not considered her very seriously. She, on the other hand, had mistaken his platonic attentions for love and when he informs her of his engagement to marry Mignon Parsons, she flies into a jealous rage, threatening dire vengeance. Walker does not appreciate the strength of her avowal, and leaves, promising to return to her her letters in his possession. But Walker little knows the fury of a woman scorned, and she at once sets to work to wreak a vengeance that is as cunning as it is terrible. Procuring a box of the choicest candy she injects a drug into each particle, and writes a note, cleverly imitating his handwriting. These she sends to Mignon who resides about ten miles distant, by a messenger boy. Some time after Harry calls in his automobile with the letters. These he gives to Mme. Lebrun, who goes to her boudoir to get his letters. While she is absent he sees the evidence of her treachery on her writing table. On her return he accuses her and she taunts him in his apparent helplessness to rescue his fiance from her impending danger. Here he is, ten miles away, and the messenger, who has much the start of him speeding by railway towards the goal. Hurling the woman aside, with an invective of denunciation, he rushes to his automobile and commands the chauffeur to drive on, disregarding all speed laws, for it is life and death in the balance. On they go like mad through lanes, around curves, over hills, slowing up for nothing. At one point in the journey a toll gate is closed, but it proves to be no handicap, for they come on relentlessly plowing through the obstacle, smashing it into pieces. At another point a farmer's wagon is seen trolling slowly across the road, and the auto coming on at a furious speed, hits and demolishes it, and passes leaving the poor farmer ruefully gazing upon the wreck. On, on goes the auto until Mignon's house is reached. But the messenger boy has arrived, delivered his charge and departed. The box is open, the note is read, and the first luscious confection lifted to the lips, when Harry rushes in, dashes the candy to the floor and folds the amazed Mignon in his arms—"Saved." Length, 940 feet.

THE WOOD-CHOPPER'S CHILD.—Synopsis of scenes: A sturdy wood-chopper, living the simple life, far away in the North Woods—happy in the companionship of a faithful wife and beautiful child, returns from work to find a false friend making love to his wife.

A terrible scene ensues in which the wrath of the wood-chopper nearly causes a murder. The villain barely escapes with his life and departs swearing to have vengeance.

Watching his opportunity, he waylays the wood-chopper's child on her way to her father—at work in the woods—with his noon-day meal, and leads the little one away.

Forcing his way through the underbrush, seeking the recesses of the forest to hide the child safe from pursuit, he misses his footing on a rocky ledge, falls to the bottom and lies helpless with a broken leg.

The child, moved to pity, binds up the fracture as best she can; makes the villain as comfortable as possible during the night, and, in the morning, starts to obtain assistance and endeavor to find her way home.

The father and mother, nearly crazed with fear and apprehension, gather their friends and organize a search for the lost one. We find them in the morning at home, hopeless with despair.

Suddenly the little one bursts in upon them—their joy is unbounded. The father is appealed to by the child to hasten to the injured man's aid; vows he will let him die first—but, in the end, the child has her way.

We see the power of a child's faith and love. The father reaches his enemy's side in time. Carries him home, where is he nursed back to health—a changed man and ever after the champion of "The Wood-chopper's Child." Approximate length, 900 feet.

WHO'S WHO—Synopsis of scenes: After twenty years' absence the captain returns—a letter announcing his arrival is sent to the home of his brother, George Morgan.

Kitty, a maid in the household, is the sweetheart of the captain's messenger, the mate; at the meeting, vows of affection are renewed.

Mrs. Morgan and her daughter, who have never met the captain, anticipate his coming.

Responsive to his brother's invitation, the captain hastens to the reunion. On the way he rescues Kitty from the insults of a tramp. Accompanying her home, his heart is ensnared, and, under the subtle spell, he accepts her invitation into the kitchen.

Left in charge of the ship the mate hears the call of "Cupid"—he leaves his post; his serenade to Kitty interrupts the lovemaking of the captain, whose dignity is offended at her suggestion of concealment.

Diplomatically she tells of her lover's murderous pugilistic inclinations; the captain, alarmed, becomes a willing captive in the cupboard.

The mate's lovemaking is of short duration. Roguish Kitty garbs him in the captain's new coat. He finds a letter in the pocket that reveals the coat's ownership. He trembles with fear.

Explanations are interrupted by Mrs. Morgan's entrance—she mistakes him for the captain—his hesitant explanations she considers a joke; bewildered he is led to the sitting room and showered with attentions.

Mr. Morgan's arrival announced in the hallway fills him with terror—watching his chance he hides under the table. Meanwhile the captain, insane with rage, smashes his way out of the cupboard—entering the sitting room he attacks his brother by mistake—their recognition terminates a lively encounter.

The panic stricken mate is dragged from beneath the table—explanations made, the mate's negligence forgiven and all join merrily in the brothers' reunion. Approximate length, 900 feet.

ONE TOUCH OF NATURE.—The story is about a young married man, who is called away from his home by an important telegram, and after kissing his wife and child a hurried farewell, rushes to his train.

The child, playing with her toys on the floor, sees her mother place a bottle on the dresser and leave the room. The little one, filled with curiosity, goes to the bureau and taking the cork from the bottle, drinks some of the contents. The bottle contains poison and the child falls in a swoon.

The mother, returning, finds the child, and realizing her condition, from the bottle of poison which the child has retained hold of, becomes frantic and rushes for aid; but the maid has gone out, the telephone wires have been cut, and in great despair she rushes back to her child, when a burglar enters through the window and holds the mother up at the point of a pistol. The mother with great joy greets the burglar and implores him to go for a doctor. He at first refuses, but she gives him all her jewels, and the baby face of the child in its helplessness appeals to him and he goes for the doctor.

The doctor arrives in time and saves the child's life. After he leaves, the burglar places all the jewels back on the mother's bureau unseen and quietly withdraws.

The husband, returning, finds the burglar leaving his house, and grappling with him, drags him into his wife's room. When all is explained and the husband realizes how the burglar saved his child's life, and how all the jewels were returned, both he and his wife offer the burglar a home with them and a chance to lead an honest life.

Alone in his nice clean room, the burglar determines to walk the straight road hereafter. Tearing up his mask and destroying his tools, he glances around and seeing a picture of the child in its nightie kneeling by its bed praying, appeals to the good heart of the man, and he falls by his bedside sobbing with his own hands clasped in prayer.

This "One Touch of Nature" makes the whole world kin. Length, 725 feet.

A PAIR OF GARTERS.—A pair of garters creates havoc in various homes through innocent adventures.

A young man presents them first to his sweetheart as a present, and her father finding them immediately gets very angry and scores the young man for his insolence, throws the garters out of the window and the boy out of the house.

A young girl passing along finds the garters, and on going to a dance with her beau, loses one of them on the ball room floor.

An old gentleman finds it and asks a very dignified old maid if she lost it. She immediately goes for him for daring to ask her such an insolent question. The old man then puts the garters in his pocket and leaves for home with his wife.

The final scene is then enacted when the wife finds the garters in her husband's pocket. She asks no explanation, but vents her anger and jealousy upon the innocent fellow. Length, 250 feet.

GAUMONT.
George Kleine.

THE POET'S VISION.—A poet in quest of inspiration saunters down the country road, his mind taken up with the beauty of nature when he meets a phantom spirit which leads him back many centuries and permits him to feast upon the ancient romance and beauty, only to shock him by a rude awakening and realization of the present conditions. Length, 356 feet.

TOO MUCH ADVICE.—Our friend Jones has a bad spell of the "tired feeling" and in this condition is receptive to all possible suggestions as to remedies to cure his imaginary illness.

His servants as well as his friends freely offer their counsel and advice, as a result of which Jones takes a hand at gardening, athletics and other sports; he tries the silence and water cures, but all to no avail other than to furnish amusement to his advisors.

His condition grows worse with each effort to regain his health until finally his family physician advises him to refrain from following the kindly suggestions of his friends if he wishes to regain his health. This counsel is faithfully followed and Jones soon performs the routine of his everyday life. Length, 638 feet.

SENTENCED TO DEATH.—The prisoner having occupied the death cell is awakened early on the morn of the day of his execution by the prison officials. Every effort is made to entertain the prisoner on the day of his execution. The fresh air, wafting in the cell, instead of cheering him, causes him to fear his catching a cold and he keeps his cell as warm and cozy as possible.

In as cordial a manner as though honored by a visit of his friends at his home he invites his executioners to be seated. Has an interesting chat with them and later he engages in a game of cards which he extends to such a time when his execution, if carried out, will be unconstitutional, and he is therefore pardoned. Length, 466 feet.

MAGIC EGGS.—An exceptionally clever series of optical illusions in which a basket of eggs and the chef take prominent parts. The chef gets a few ideas on the mysteries of the culinary art and is stupefied by a veritable storm of eggs.

Intensely interesting, amusing and very mystifying. Artistically colored throughout. Length, 384 feet.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.
(George Kleine.)

THE SQUIRE AND THE NOBLE LORD.—Rosie, a pretty village maiden, is engaged to be married to the squire, a manly fellow, liked by everybody.

The noble lord of the town castle, visiting the village, meets Rosie, and is immediately charmed by her beauty. He endeavors to kiss her for which he receives a merited rebuke from the squire. Enraged, the lord orders the former's arrest and he is carried off to prison.

Rosie consults her friends and then concludes to call at the castle to intercede for her betrothed.

The lord, intending to humiliate the squire, orders him brought forth and then again attempts familiarities with Rosie, not thinking that the squire would presume to resent the insult irrespective of the consequences. A violent encounter is caused and in the struggle the lord falls over the balustrade of the terrace. Before the guards realize what has happened, the squire and Rosie make their departure on a horse, escaping in the shadows of the night. Length, 436 feet.

FOUND ON THE ROCKS.—A group of fishermen are seen seated at a table in front of a resort. The waitress is serving refreshments when one of the men attempts to force his attentions upon her. One of the fishermen intercedes and a fight is on. While the two are belaboring each other one of the older men interferes. The incident is apparently over, but for the malice born in the heart of the younger of the two combatants against the old fisherman, and we see the men take leave from their families to follow their calling. Out on the sea the old man and the young fellow he interfered with are detailed to set the nets. While the older man is thus engaged the young man pushes him out of the boat, and rows back to the vessel, thinking the old fisherman will be drowned. The vessel returning to dock is met by the family of the fisherman and the sad news of the accident at sea imparted, causing great grief. The son, however, vows that he will find his father, and seeking the aid of another the two start out to sea in a little row boat. They scan the shores and are finally rewarded by the sight of a man's prostrate figure on the rocks. When they arrive the son administers a refreshing draught to his father and he revives. The true story is soon learned and together they return to their village where the guilty fisherman is found drinking. When he looks up at his supposedly dead victim he becomes affrighted and seeks pardon, but the police, who have been called, take him into custody, and he is subjected to the penalties prescribed by law for the deed he committed. Length, 549 feet.

PATHE FRERES.

THE LEGEND OF THE FORGET-ME-NOT.—This artistically colored film tells an interesting little love story, in the first scene of which we see a pretty maiden out walking with her very exacting mother. They meet a dashing youth, who becomes impressed with the young lady's beauty and tries to have a word with her, but meets with a cold rebuff from the old woman, who seeing that her daughter shows a fondness for the gentle stranger, hurries home with the girl. Not to be foiled in his purpose, the youth follows them, but each time that he draws near the maiden, the cross old mother chases him away.

The ambitious woman has other designs for her beautiful daughter, and is trying to force her into a marriage with an ugly looking old fellow with lots of money, who showers beautiful gifts upon his adored one, but the girl will have nothing to do with him, and drives him out of the place.

One night, thinking that the mother is in bed, the young Romeo comes to the window and is in earnest conversation with his Juliet, when the old woman spies them from her window above and throws a pail of water down on the young lover. She then drags her daughter to the latter's room, where she locks her safely in. The girl, however, determined to have her way, takes a sheet and after fastening it to the window sill, slides down to the street, where she joins her lover. The pair then run away, but it is not long before they are missed by the mother, who quickly starts in pursuit. On the way she meets her daughter's wealthy admirer, and he also joins in the chase. They soon come upon the couple in the park, where the latter are picking forget-me-nots. A scuffle ensues and the youth is thrown into the water, and as he disappears from sight a beautiful transformation scene takes place, and a spray of forget-me-nots rises up as if by magic from the still, cool water below, and forms before the distracted girl's eyes the words "Do not forget me." Length, 541 feet.

PAUL HAS DECIDED TO MARRY.—Realizing that he has arrived at the age when he must look at things in a more serious light and feeling that he has enjoyed the freedom of bachelorhood long enough, Paul decides to marry. He gets busy, therefore, and sends out a lot of invitations to his friends to join him in a little blowout in honor of his last day of bachelorhood. An old sweetheart happening upon one of the invitations and feeling the pangs of jealousy, takes on in a rather strenuous manner, and vows to have revenge upon him for his deception.

All the friends gather at his bachelor quarters and start out to have a big time; their first joke is played on an old couple who are snuggled up in bed. The revelers ring the door bell until the old fellow comes out, whereupon they detain him against his will. The old lady then comes out to look for her husband, and the crowd of funmakers compel them to stand on the sidewalk in their nightclothes. The little cast-off sweetheart hands the old pair Paul's card and tells them to call on him for damages. Next they enter a cafe, where they raise a veritable rough house, and in the fracas the police are called in, whereupon Paul is arrested for disorderly conduct. The spiteful little creature again makes her appearance and passes the unknown culprit's card around to all those whose feelings are wounded by the affair.

The next morning Paul shows up at the home of his fiancee just in time for the wedding, looking the worse for wear after his big night. To his horror he is besieged by all the people possessing his card, who insist upon heavy damages. Finally his intended father-in-law comes to his aid and squares matters up, after which they proceed with the ceremony. Length, 417 feet.

A PAIR OF WHITE GLOVES.—A prosperous looking young man arrives at a hotel, and after being assigned to a room, makes a most elaborate toilet before going out in search of diversion. When he is ready to depart, however, he discovers that he is in need of a pair of white gloves to complete his immaculate appearance. So, going to the telephone, he calls up a shop and orders a pair, and soon a young lady appears on the scene ready to fit him. As she is about to fasten one of the gloves, the button snaps, but this is soon remedied, for she has a needle and thread handy, and after sewing another one on, takes her departure.

The young man then goes forth in a most felicitous frame of mind and is driven to a select cafe, where he sits down to enjoy a good dinner. As he glances about him at the other diners he recognizes a female acquaintance sitting at the next table. He sees that she recognizes him, so he takes out a piece of paper and writes her a note, asking her to meet him that evening near the club. The girl and her companion soon leave the place, and as she passes, the youth slips her the note without being discovered.

In the next picture we see the happy young fellow waiting at the appointed place. Soon the lady comes along in an auto. After an affectionate greeting, the youth also steps into the machcine and accompanies his friend to her home. As they enter the house a rough-looking character on the sidewalk watches the prosperous-looking couple in a rather peculiar manner, but the latter pass in without paying the slightest attention to the stranger.

Arriving in the lady's parlor, the latter proceeds to remove her wraps, and in order to be more comfortable, she takes a beautiful pearl collar from her neck and places it in a jewel case which is lying on the table. She then leaves the room for a few moments, and during her absence the temptation to steal the valuable piece of jewelry masters her companion, and we see him slip the collar into his pocket. The evening is happily spent, and when the young man takes his leave the lady accompanies him to the gate and bids him a fond adieu. As he saunters down the street he accidentally drops his gloves, and the suspicious looking character, who watched them enter the house, picks them up and puts them on. The ruffian then steals into the house through an open window and is prowling around the parlor in search of valuables, when the lady, who by this time has retired, misses her collar and returns to the parlor to get it. Hearing approaching footsteps, the burglar hides behind a chair; the woman enters and not finding her jewels becomes alarmed and in her excitement shrieks for help. The fellow then springs from his hiding place and attacks the helpless girl, who in the ensuing struggle receives a death blow and falls at the mans feet. The murder, quickly removing the gloves, throws them on the floor beside his victim and makes his escape from the house.

When the crime is discovered and the detectives are called in, they find the gloves and immediately start out in search of their owner. Through the trade mark they trace them to the shop where they were purchased, and when they are shown to the saleslady she at once identifies them as the ones which she sold to the young man at the hotel. They then go to the hostelry, where they find the youth, who is just about to leave the place. He is detained and accused of the crime, but stoutly denies his guilt. On searching his belongings the detectives come upon the missing jewels. The youth is then led to the scene of the crime, where he is confronted with the victim as well as with the girl who sold him the gloves, which play such an important part in the case as circumstantial evidence. The unfortunate young man stoutly maintains his innocence, but the evidence is too strong against him and he is shackled and led away to prison, charged with the terrible crime. As he enters a carriage with the detectives, the real murderer, one of the curious crowd looking on, smiles with satisfaction as he sees the innocent man taken to pay the penalty of the crime of which he alone is guilty. Length, 1,012 feet.

THERE'S NO FOOL LIKE AN OLD FOOL.—This cleverly acted comedy shows us an old fellow who has a great propensity for flirting with every pretty woman he meets. One day he accompanies his wife to the dressmaker's, where he leaves her to have a new gown tried on while he saunters down the street in search of diversion.

His wife puts on the new gown, and after throwing a heavy veil over her face, she goes out to keep an appointment with one of her admirers. Her husband, not recognizing her in the new gown, follows her for a long distance, until finally she turns into a hotel, where she meets her friend. The old flirt, not to be thwarted in his design to make her acquaintance, waits outside. After some time the woman glances out of the window, when, to her great horror, she recognizes her husband standing at the door of the hotel. Fearing his anger should he see her, she changes clothes with the colored bell boy, and the latter, heavily veiled, is seen leaving the hotel. The old flirt, thinking he is the woman for whom he has been waiting, follows on. When the supposed beauty stops in front of a jewelry store the old fool approaches her and offers to buy her a watch, so they go in and make the purchase and then repair to a cafe, where they sit down to have some refreshments. The old beau gets the shock of his life when he assists his fair companion to remove her veil, and he makes a hasty exit.

His wife is waiting for him as he enters his home, and denounces him for staying away so long. He attempts to offer some lame excuse, but when his indignant better half finds the veil in his pocket he confesses all, and producing the watch presents her with it, and thereby makes her so happy that she forgives the old simpleton and calls matters square. Length, 804 feet.

MARTYRDOM OF LOUIS XVII.—This richly colored picture revives an interesting incident in French history and shows us some of the famous events connected with the overthrow of the power of Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette.

In the first scene we see the royal family, which consists of King Louis XVI., Marie Antoinette and their two daughters, and their son, Louis XVII., the latter is heir presumptive to the French throne. They are apparently very happy in their domestic surroundings, but the nation is precipitating itself into the horrors of revolution and the next view shows us the mob surrounding the palace and beating its way into the royal family's private quarters. The latter flee for their lives from one part of the palace to another in a vain attempt to evade the ruffians. Finally the mob takes possession of the place and subjects the royal family to the most humiliating insults, keeping them prisoners in a room where the guards watch over them until the time comes for the King to be torn from his loved ones and condemned to death. The little heir to the throne is then torn from his heartbroken mother and turned over to the care of the cobbler Simon, who takes him to his hut and abuses the little fellow most shamefully, subjecting him to all sorts of trying insults. Finally the little fellow is thrown into a dungeon, where in a dream he sees his noble father going to be executed. When the child is nearly dead from exposure and starvation he is taken out of his prison and carried to the home of a sympathizer, where, in the presence of a few kind ones, he passes away. Length, 656 feet.

HUNGARY.—Pictures of this sort are always an innovation both from an entertainment and educational standpoint, for we are brought in close proximity with the people in far away countries and have an opportunity of studying their ways and customs, which in every respect are so different from our own. In this picture we are taken for a trip to Hungary and see the peasants in their simple surroundings enjoying life, and it is extremely interesting to see the quaint costumes worn by those people. We see them in their different native dances, also get a good view of their peculiar manner of celebrating a wedding ceremony, in which the whole village turns out in gala attire to do honor to the happy couple. Length, 325 feet.

SELIG POLYSCOPE CO.

A FIGTING CHANCE.—In the foothills of Colorado there lived an old cattleman by the name of Jed Spooner. He had long since relinquished his rights as head of the household over which he should have presided, to his very strenuous and iron-willed wife, who was known far and wide as "the boss of the Clear Creek Ranch." Susan, their only daughter, a handsome and impetuous girl of the Western range, was courted and much sought after by the young ranchmen and cowboys of that vicinity. George Graves was the favored one, however, and being a young man of industrious habits and exemplary conduct, he soon won the favor of the mother, and that, of course, placed him head and shoulders above all his rivals.

Now, old Jed Spooner was in the habit of slipping away unbeknown to his watchful wife and partaking of the liquid refreshments which were to be obtained at a nearby roadside saloon. On these occasions he was wont to imbibe so freely that he usually became nerved up to almost dare defy the will of his robust mate.

Meeting him at his favorite haunt one day, "Texas Joe," a rather unpopular cowman of the valley, plies the old man so freely with "Red Oak" whiskey that he soon has him in a melting mood and ready to grant Joe any favor within his power. "I want yer darter for my wife, Jed," whispers the half intoxicated bully. "She is yours for the askin', Joe," replies the boozy old ranchman. So with many expressions of mutual regard and admiration the two, arm in arm, roll out of the saloon and over the hill path to the ranch, to acquaint Susan with the wishes of her fond father and devoted admirer.

Out in front of the old ranch house stands Susan watching some of the boys at a game of poker. Hearing a shout in the distance she raises her eyes, and then a look of disgust spreads over her face, for coming towards the group is the hated "Texas Joe" supporting her hilarious old dad, who by this time is hardly able to walk. She starts to enter the house, but her father calls her back, and taking her hand roughly places it in the grasp of his friend Joe, at the same time informing her that Joe is to be her husband. With indignation stamped on her face our pretty heroine gives him a look of unutterable scorn, and turning her back on them walks into the house.

Now this independence on the part of his daughter fires old Spooner to uncontrollable wrath, and staggering after her drags her back and insists upon her giving her consent to the union he at present so much desires. No one notices the approach of young Graves, who happens upon the scene just in time to overhear the old man's command. Taking in the situation at a glance, he pushes the drunken father aside and placing his arm about the form of his sweetheart informs old Spooner and "Texas Joe" that in the future he will guide the destinies of the young lady in question. This is more than Joe can swallow. With a roar of indignant rage he springs forward to punish the fearless young man for his audacity, but a well directed blow from the iron fist of George sends him sprawling to the ground. Staggering to his feet, he attempts to draw his pistol, but again the quick eye of the cattleman thwarts him and he gazes into the barrel of a wicked looking 45.

"Cut the cards for a chance for the girl," shouts one of the excited cowpunchers who has been an interested spectator of the little drama. "Agreed," replies Joe. Both men lay down their weapons. The cards are shuffled; both men cut. George wins. With a sudden bound the furious Texan wheels and grasps his gun, and raising it fires point blank at his fortunate rival, but his aim being unsteady the bullet plows its way through the plump arm of Susan. "He has shot the girl! Kill him!" shout the cowboys as they start in pursuit of the fleeing assassin.

Headed by George they lose no time in getting on the track of the fugutive, although he has partially succeeded in throwing them off the trail. Over the rocks, through the canyons, down the mountain sides they go, until finally by a well directed shot Joe falls to the ground with a bullet through his thigh. He is dragged back to the ranch and the general sentiment is for a necktie festival, but before old Spooner, who is suddenly turned against his former friend, has time to lead a movement in that direction, his valiant wife descends upon the scene, and immediately the old codger's valor reaches a low ebb. Driving him into the house, the old lady scatters the rest of the mob. At Susan's wish "Texas Joe" is allowed to go his way in peace, but with instructions to make himself scarce on the Clear Creek Range. Length, 689 feet.

A GOOD IDEA.

At the Dewey Theater this week they have overcome the objection to the lack of titles by placing the titles of the films on the stage as they do the names of the vaudeville acts. This serves two purposes. First, the lack of a title on so many films mars the exhibitions somewhat. Next, when a patron enters while the film is being run he knows what the subject it. It would be well if all theaters adopted this plan, even though the titles were always given.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

OUTCAST OR HEROINE.—An English soldier of Puritan days falls in love with a maiden who is an outcast from the community. During an Indian outbreak she braves all danger and brings the soldiers from the barracks miles away, saving the lives of her traducers. Length, 550 feet.

THE DYNAMITE WAISTCOAT.—Hans, a German cobbler of a mining camp, whose wife has been annoyed by the town bully, starts out for revenge and gets a good trouncing. Returning home, he hits upon a clever scheme whereby the tables are turned and the bully given an unwelcome surprise. Length, 365 feet.

THE LOST SHEEP.—Picturing the experience of a young woman clerk who forsakes home and friends for a chance acquaintance, only to be deserted herself. She finally returns home, is forgiven, and resolves never again to give up the old friends for the new. Length, 595 feet.

A FAITHFUL FOOL.—Two cavaliers aspire for the hand of the prince's daughter. She loves one while her father favors the other. The latter carries the girl away, but is detected by the jester, who informs the lover. Together they effect the girl's release, the jester losing his life in serving the lady so faithfully. Length, 315 feet.

THE WOODEN INDIAN.—Two raggedy looking tramps are seen coming down the street in the residential section. They stop in front of the house and ask for food. The lady refuses, orders them away, and as they go ducks them with a pail of water. At the next house they are also refused and a bulldog is set upon them. At last they meet with success, the woman giving them a ham bone and a bundle of clothes. Upon opening the package it is found to contain an old Prince Albert coat, light pants, an old silk hat and an Indian costume. Coming to the business section, they notice a sign in front of a store, announcing that it will shortly be opened as a first-class cigar emporium. One of the hoboes gets an idea. To his companion he unfolds a plan to dress in the Indian costume and sell the figure to the cigar dealer. His pal is delighted, and going into a barn nearby they change clothes. One dresses himself as the Indian, while the chum puts on the other clothes, represents himself as an agent, goes to the cigar store, introduces himself to the proprietor and succeeds in disposing of the Indian figure. He then returns to the barn, finds an old crate, into which he packs his friend. An express wagon is hailed and the crate is delivered to the cigar store, opened and the figure placed in position. After considerable trouble the Indian is satisfactorily located and the agent receives his money. The cigar man thinks he will make the image more secure, so takes a hammer and proceeds to drive a nail through the Indian's foot. At this the tramp loses his nerve entirely and kicks the proprietor. The jig is up and both tramps start at breakneck speed down the street. In turning the corner they run into the arms of two policemen, who lead them away amidst the cheers of the jolly crowd. Length, 400 feet.

ADVENTURES OF A DRUMMER BOY.—In the home of a Union officer his three children are playing soldier, the oldest, a boy of 12, acting as captain over his two sisters, who are younger. The father is about to leave for the front and is taking leave of his family. The little boy clings to father, begs to be taken along, and is gently but firmly refused. As the husband departs, the wife and children re-enter the cottage. Presently the boy takes his sword and toy drum and, unseen by his mother, leaves the house and goes in the direction taken by his father. The youngster reaches the Union encampment and is being questioned by the general as the father comes up and stands horrified to find his boy there. The little fellow salutes and asks to be made a drummer boy. The father again refuses and orders a soldier to take the boy home. This cannot be done, as the enemy surrounded the camp, and the father is finally obliged to grant the request. The new recruit is equipped with a uniform, given a real drum, and proudly marches off with a scouting party. They have proceeded but a short distance when they are fired upon by the enemy and forced to return to camp. The strength of the enemy is unknown and the general instructs a soldier to secure this information. While the conversation between them is going on the little drummer boy puts on a pair of overalls, takes a market basket on his arm and starts out for the necessary information. While crossing a field, the boy is intercepted by the enemy. They question him, but his apparent innocence saves him and he is allowed to proceed on his way, not until, however, he has counted the soldiers. Returning to the Union camp with the good news, plans are made for an immediate attack. The soldiers, including the little scout, attack the enemy and drive them off, then return to camp, where the little drummer boy is adorned with a medal for his bravery. The trouble over for the time being, the father secures a leave of absence and returns home, taking the little hero with him. Length, 620 feet.

THE DEACON'S HOLIDAY.—Saturday, a day of work, sees the deacon in his office taking things easy. He is sitting in his comfortable chair, smoking a cigarette and life is a dream. Sunday, however, his day of rest, soon starts. The first thing in the morning the children wake up about 4 o'clock and raise a big noise, blowing horns, beating drums, etc., etc. The poor deacon next has to wash the dishes and then the family go out for a ride in the park. They all get into one carriage. After riding a short while, the horse is unable to pull the load, and the deacon must get out and push on the carriage. Then one of the wheels break. The deacon runs off a short distance and borrows a push-cart from a peddler. All the children pile on the push-cart and the wife gets on the deacon's back, and he carries them home in this manner. He reaches home, exhausted by his day of rest. Monday, another work day, finds him at his office again, asleep in his chair. Length, 450 feet.

AUTOMATIC NURSING BOTTLE. — A baby's mother goes out, leaving it with its grandfather, an old knife-sharpener, who has a large rotary grindstone in his room. The baby starts to cry and the old man goes for its bottle of milk, but, unfortunately drops it, and all his efforts to amuse the child and attract its attention away from the dinner are without avail. He finally hits upon a scheme of putting some milk in a can connected with a hose to the baby's mouth, and also puts a jumping jack on the grind-stone to amuse the baby. He then makes the grind-stone go fast and the milk is automatically pumped into the baby's mouth. Length, 167 feet.

NELLIE'S LOVE STORY.—Nellie is a country lass, living in a small town in Italy, who is in love with a farmer, of whom her father disapproves. He is heartbroken and attempts suicide, but the attempt is unsuccessful and he staggers on until found by some compassionate peasants, who administer to his needs. They learn of his love affair and send for Nellie, who appears before him dressed up in splendid clothes. He does not know her in this garb, but when she dons the attire of a farmer's daughter, he recognizes her and they fall into each other's arms. Shortly after, they are married. Length, 750 feet.

VIOLETS.—The children of a rich family are out walking with their mother, when they pass the home of a poor little shepherdess, who has a large quantity of violets around her. Christmas time comes and the two children are having a joyous time, but the poor little shepherdess is sick. When spring returns the children go again to pick violets and then think of the little shepherdess, whom they go to visit. They enter the house and find her dying. Length, 420 feet.

THE STATE SECRET.—A Raleigh & Robert film of high dramatic interest. The Secretary of War intrusts some important documents to an orderly and urges upon him their great value and secrecy. The orderly is followed by a spy who manages so that they two are the only occupants of a railway carriage. While the orderly's back is turned the spy fells him with a blow and tries to obtain the papers. The orderly struggles and seeing he is being overpowered he throws the state document out of the car window. The struggle goes on and the spy forces open the carriage door and hurls the orderly down an embankment. The papers have meanwhile been picked up by a girl who recognizes their value and when the spy traces and demands the papers she refuses and is about to be roughly handled when her father enters and cows the spy and holds him while the girl hurries to the military headquarters and surprises the poor orderly who has dragged himself back and is telling of his loss, by handing over the precious package. Length, 561 feet.

A TRAITOR TO HIS KING.—A dramatic film by Cricks & Martin. A young man learns of the treachery of one of the King's men, who manages to get the young man confined in prison. His sweetheart bribes the jailer and drugs him while she secures the release of her lover and both set upon and bind the villain who has come to gloat upon his victim. In the pockets of the villain are found the proofs of treason which are laid before the King and valor is rewarded. Length, 730 feet.

LAST DAYS OF POMPEII.—This magnificent spectacular subject is one of the grandest films ever produced. A story of heart interest leads up to the climax which is a splendid representation of one of the greatest events in history. Raleigh & Roberts, 1,001 feet.

FOOLSHEAD WISHES TO COMMIT SUICIDE.—In this Itala film we recognize a comedian who starred in many of Pathe's best comedies. Foolshead proposes to a damsel who rejects him and his various attempts to commit suicide are as comical as they are fruitless. He finally blows himself up with gunpowder but his remains are pieced together by kind citizens and he is still much alive as the curtain drops. Length, 472 feet.

PURITAN MAID.—A Clarendon film of the Cromwell period. The Puritan maid shields and secretes a young man who is pursued by the Roundheads. She disguises him so that he escapes and they are later seen together receiving the King's blessing. Length, 610 feet.

A PLUCKY LITTLE GIRL.—In this Hepwix film is shown a remarkable picture of canine sagacity and girlish bravery. A tramp robs a bank messenger, leaving him insensible by the roadside. A girl and dog at play find the victim and summon help, while the dog picks up the scent and leads his mistress to the home of the robber. Entering quietly she picks up the robber's own revolver and marches him into the street and into the arms of a policeman. Later she returns the bag of money to the bank messenger, who has recovered. Length, 500 feet.

GIVE ME A LIGHT.—"Rufus of the Road" is wearily wandering along the wayside, as Chauncey, the choicy one, passes and disgustedly flings aside the butt of his cigar, which Rufus the Roadster cheerfully picks up. Having no match, Rufus is in sore straits to obtain a light. After many ridiculous situations and side-splitting episodes, Rufus in sheer desperation attempts to light his cigar from a fuse connecting a bomb which has been set by a band of conspirators.

Rufus takes a light and an aerial flight.

There is some rich American humor in the many scenes of this film, even if the victim of the fun is the poor American tramp.

LOST IN THE SNOW.—The love of man for dogs has from times unrecorded been a matter of pride and accomplishments; but the love of dog for his master, man, has been a matter of touching beauty. The dog's place in civilization with all its conflicts and achievements, its struggles and vicissitudes, its victories and dangers, has been nearer to man—as companion and personal aid, than any of the lower animals; if the cow, the sheep, camel and horse have been power and sustenance in man's necessity—the dog has occupied a more personal and sympathetic position, a more human place, since his intelligence has made it possible to offer assistance in danger, and genuine voluntary aid, and in some cases has proven to be a real heroic being, realizing his possibilities and power.

The story here told in film, is one which illustrates the wonderful achievements of the great St. Bernard dogs in rescuing children in the terrible snow drifts of the wintry Alps, and the subsequent joy that was entailed by the remarkable achievement.

We will pay to any charity designated the sum of Ten Thousand Dollars if we cannot prove that we are purchasing at least one print for each of our offices of the entire output of the

INTERNATIONAL PROJECTING AND PRODUCING CO.

"The independent film renter is scouting like mad for second-hand films. This is proof enough that the average independent does not intend to become a regular purchaser of the regular weekly output of the independent manufacturer, but intends to buy only when it suits him. This tendency in itself means failure for any concerted independent movement, and the Moving Picture Patents Company knows this and therefore they can afford to smile at the grandiloquent promises made by the Independents and the fierce threats made against the Trust. The simple, solid truth is that the vast number of exchanges that claim to be independent are running on the mangiest of junk and the outcry of their subscribers is painful. Already the business of many independent shows has been ruined and some of them are closing their doors."

The above paragraph appeared in the Moving Picture World on page 361, issue of March 27, 1909, under the caption of "Observations by Our Man About Town," and is the cause of our publishing the above offer. This paragraph was probably published with a view of ridiculing the INDEPENDENT movement and INDEPENDENT exchange. As this article has appeared, we wish to say, as America's Largest Film Exchange, either TRUST or INDEPENDENT, that the facts published are, in the main, true. There are many small wild-cat exchanges representing themselves as being Independent which are really the back door of some TRUST film exchange who are endeavoring to make their "junk" film earn them something.

In securing INDEPENDENT service, Mr. Exhibitor, you want to be sure that you are dealing with an exchange that is INDEPENDENT and buying INDEPENDENT film, and not endeavoring to palm off on you their old Trust "junk" film.

As the best proof of our ability to handle your account with new Independent films and to prove our responsibility to you, we refer you to

"Good Morning! Have you paid your $2.00 for a license to smoke your own pipe this week?"

"My country 'tis of thee, sweet land of Liberty, of thee I sing." Ever hear that before?

"SWAMPED!"

With hundreds of wildly enthusiastic letters and telegrams, congratulating me on becoming

INDEPENDENT!

—I am doing the biggest film renting business of my life?

—I have gained more new customers in the week since I announced my quitting the Patents Company than I ever did in any three weeks combined!

—I've got a stack of letters and telegrams higher than my head, demanding my personal attention, but which I have not had time to answer.

—My branch managers in eight cities wire me that they are in the same fix; that letters and telegrams of congratulations are pouring in upon them. They are sending frantic orders for additional supplies of all sorts. They are as crazy over the new turn of affairs as I am!

—It is the most tremendous public ovation ever given anyone in the moving picture business, and it proves that the exhibitors are heart and soul with the independent movement.

—Customers of mine who damned me most frightfully a week ago are now falling upon my neck in pure joy.

—Others who realize that I knew just exactly what I was doing all the time commend me for my care and caution in first making sure that the Independents could deliver high-class films before I would handle their product.

—Even my new Denver office, which is the baby of the family—only one week old—has started off with a crush of business.

—All this shows which way the wind is blowing. It sounds the death knell of monopoly. It puts a quietus on the license proposition. It is the voice of the people, and I want to say that when old Vox Populi gets busy he has some voice!

A thousands thanks, fellow fighters, and a renewal of my iron clad promise to give you the best films and the best service at all times in spite of Hades itself!

Tim Noonan and Mary Flinn are sweethearts. Both are employed in a box factory, but Tim arouses the ire of the boss and is discharged. Things go badly with him and he is finally down and out and evicted from his boarding place. Driven to desperation through hunger he steals a piece of pie from a restaurant. He is chased and enters a vacant house, where he overpowers the pursuing policeman and takes away his cap and coat, in which he manages to escape the rest of the mob. Thus garbed, he is approached by an Italian woman, who demands his help, as her husband is at home wildly drunk and threatens to kill them all.. Here is a predicament. However, he goes and succeeds in hauling the fellow to the station house. He proves to be a desperate and much sought for criminal, so Tim is rewarded for his bravery by a position on the force. He then goes and claims Mary as his bride. Length, 876 feet.

RELEASE, TUESDAY, APRIL 27, 1909.

In this picture we find Jocko, a full size automatic monkey, taking a hand at the fine arts. He demonstrates his ability with the brush and palette, wins laurels as a sculptor, tries architecture and proves an apt scholar of music. Fascinating to young and old.

"HOW THEY PROPOSE"

Comedy. Approx. Length, 292 feet.

RELEASE, TUESDAY, APRIL 27, 1909.

Theory and practice have always been somewhat at variance and in this series of views the practice of proposing is illustrated from the view point of the novelist and of the every-day practitioner.

The author of the novel has a peculiar sentimental manner of the hero meeting the heroine, etc., the kitchen maid has a rule of action in vogue in her sphere, the traveler in the coach follows precedents long established and the god of the gallery gives way to the manner of his type. Very amusing throughout.

"BEFORE AND AFTER"

Comedy. Approx. Length, 357 feet.

RELEASE, TUESDAY, APRIL 27, 1909.

This subject illustrates the charming manners of a modest young lady in her quest for a husband.

She is attentive, solicitous and loving so that the young fellows falls an easy victim to her plan of action. Six months after the wedding ceremony matters look a trifle different at the home of the young couple.

The wife, once devoted and painstaking, is now more interested in the pages of a novel, while her husband is busily engaged in the details of the housemaid's occupation.

"AN UNWRITTEN LETTER"

Drama. Approx. Length, 1060 feet.

RELEASE, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 28, 1909.

A beautifully pathetic story, well dramatized and of unexcelled photographic quality.

A blind grandmother is escorted to church by her nephew. As the two leave the church edifice to return to their home they meet a number of young men friends of the nephew. When later the young man is out in public his frinds ridicule him for having escorted a blind woman to church. He pretends to ignore their taunts, but when they persist with their annoyance he slaps one of them in the face. For this he is challenged to a duel.

Returning to his home he imparts the facts to his father. The grandmother is to know nothing of the affair and as explation to her a journey is arranged and all accompany the noble young fellow to the station. The journey, however, is not one on business as alleged, but to the field of honor. The seconds return after the duel and report to the father the death of his son.

Almost heartbroken the parents share with each other their grief, but cannot apprise the grandmother of their loss and sorrow. Daily she waits for news of her nephew, who has always proven a devoted companion to her, and she cannot explain why he does not write.

The parents finally determine to deceive her and accordingly they insert a blank sheet of paper in an envelope properly addressed which is delivered by the mail carrier. They eagerly tear it open and with great difficulty the mother pretends to read from the blank pages an account of his experiences and endearing words of solicitation for her welfare.

One day as another message is received and she is seated alone in the garden she calls to the gardener, whom she hears close by, to come to her to read the letter.

The gardener, not knowing of the deception, discloses to her that the pages she holds are blank. When soon after the daughter reappears and learns of the incident she tearfully relates the truth to her aged parent and together they share the sorrow of their grief and irreparable loss.

"TWO LADIES AND A BEGGAR"

Comedy. Approx. Length, 690 feet.

RELEASE, SATURDAY, MAY 1, 1909.

Anxious to avoid working for a living a vagrant contrives an appliance by means of which he appears to be deprived of his limbs and obliged to wheel himself about in a little cart, and seek public charity.

Two good old ladies take pity upon the fellow and after investigating decide to give the poor unfortunate all possible aid.

Accordingly they cut down his trousers to what they deem more suitable length, secure specially appointed rooms with furniture of size and style adaptable to a man afflicted as he purports to be and even endeavor to secure him a wife from among other unfortunates of his type.

All is graciously received by the impostor until the wife is tendered, when he exposes himself and flees.

The Perfect Film.

Ever since the publication of the widely advertised assertion that the moving picture photographs sent out by the associated manufacturers were "perfect" we have taken careful note of them from a purely photographic standpoint. It is astonishing, when one looks at them with the eye of knowledge and experience, how far off they appear, not merely from perfection but even from superexcellence. In writing thus we would have the reader understand that we are looking upon these productions merely as monochromatic renderings of an original; in fact, impressions in developed silver of all the lights, shadows and gradations of a nature subject. This, we submit, is the proper way of judging of the purely technical end of the work as distinguished from the pictorial and dramatic. Technically, then, what do we find? Why, bold as the assertion may look, some of the manufacturers, in the current idiom of the time, are not even commencing to make a moving picture photograph. Careful analysis shows, just to give the reader some idea of what we have in mind, that the tone values of these pictures are altogether false and that they grievously misrepresent the original. The light parts of the pictures are far too light; the dark parts too dark, and there are no middle tints or gradations. Let us make curselves perfectly clear by concrete example. Before us, as we write this, is the unromantic view of a back yard. A distant wall is in shadow; then we come to another wall somewhat lighter in tone; next we pass to a roof upon which there is reflected sun-light; finally we pass to the sky which is brighter still. All these parts of the picture have what is called a relative luminosity or brightness to the eye, and any photograph which purports to be a representation of this view must show these relative luminosities or brightnesses, as the case may be, properly proportioned one to the other. If the reader will apply these methods of comparison to a moving picture when he next critically examines it, he will be surprised how much out it is likely to be when he sees that the contrasts of the picture, that is to say, the difference between the extreme shadow and the extreme high lights, "hits him in the eye" then he will know that something is wrong. That "something" is that the picture fails to actually represent the luminosities, tone values or gradations of the original work. The remedy for this is obvious. Accurate exposure and careful development will prevent excessive contrast in the picture, which will thus show a more harmonious effect to the eye.

This is only one of several little technical respects in which we think that moving pictures, as a whole, are open to reasonable criticism. We make the criticism, not for hypercritical purposes, that is to say, not for the purpose of finding fault in a superior way or airing our own opinions or knowledge of the subject, but rather for the purpose of directing the attention of those responsible for the exposure and development of the pictures to the fact that the work does not, at present, manifest the highest form of technique which they are capable of imparting to it. And these remarks we would have it understood are of general application. They apply as much to imported films as to those made in this country, although, of course, in both sources of supply there are exceptions to our strictures.

The Moving Picture in Summer.

With the close of the Winter season and the opening of Summer there is bound to be a diminution of the attendance at moving picture houses in large cities. But this need not interfere with the popularity of the moving picture as a whole. The American public is a very out-of-doors public. Probably no other people on the face of the globe so strenuously lead the outdoor life in the Summer season and demand an unceasing variety and change of amusement to fill up their time. Taking New York as a typical great center of population: A feature of the Summer season is the great popularity of the moving picture at the various beaches and other ocean resorts which are so conveniently situated near to the metropolis. At those places you see the moving picture on every hand. Indeed, we, ourselves, one Summer night at Dreamland last year, never enjoyed anything so much as sitting and sipping our liquid refreshment as we watched a very excellent moving picture on the open-air screen. In our company was a friend from England. His remark was: "Why, this is quite Continental." Continental, we may explain for the information of the reader, means approximating to the outdoor life of France, Germany and other European countries, where much is made of alfresco entertainment. We think, therefore, that the exhibitor will be wise who, this coming Summer, takes every advantage of the opportunities given to him of showing moving pictures out-of-doors at night. The better these pictures are, the more people they will attract. There is something very brain-resting in sitting under the starlit sky and watching a mimic representation of life on a stage. More especially, in the case of a moving picture, as the action is easily followed at a distance, and the loss of the human voice is not felt. In this respect the silent stage has a great advantage over the talking stage. As our readers well know, open-air plays generally fail by reason of the fact that the voices of the players do not carry well beyond a certain distance. We have heard much recently about the "up-lift" of the moving picture in theaters. Now it remains for those who are responsible for outdoor entertainments, these next six months, to see what they can do in the way of attracting pleasure-seekers to the alfresco moving picture amidst pleasant, proper surroundings. There is money in the idea, and we hope that manufacturers, renters and exhibitors will make the best of it.

More About the "Uplift."

The salvation of the moving picture business is being quietly and effectively worked out in ways that may not be familiar to some and certainly not to the exact liking of all concerned. The film censorship is going along smoothly, although several manufacturers are being hit pretty hard. The Patents Company have been instrumental in influencing the legislators and the Mayor to more favorable action. They are now working in unison with the Liberal Sunday League to frame up a law in regard to Sunday opening that will be satisfactory to all. It is hoped that the decisions arrived at will be of national benefit, as well as the decisions of the Censorship Board. The action of police officials, such as has been seen in the police censorship in many cities, was far more unsatisfactory; in fact, in many cases that came to our notice they were ridiculous. That some censorship was necessary, everyone will admit. We have before us a letter dated January 10, from an exhibitor, in which he complained bitterly of the sensational films. This was before the Censorship Board was heard of. We did not publish the letter at the time, as several films released about that time were severely scored, and especially one manufacturer, to whom we referred the complaint. The exhibitor said that this manufacturer "made the best films and also the worst, and the only films that ran perfectly on a good machine." Who was he? (Gentlemen of the associated manufacturers, don't all speak at once.) There are some passages from the letter of the exhibitor which we will quote:

"Another of the revolting scenes is shown in '——— ———,' which was an artistic portrayal; yet a great many of my patrons expressed regret at seeing it. A number of my lady patrons have not been to a moving picture show since. Cannot the manufacturers depict crime without going into too many of the morbid details? I should suggest that whenever they show crime in any form that they go enough into the detail to show that the criminal gets punished, making a healthy moral to the picture, instead of not neglecting a single morbid detail of a crime, and then too often forgetting to show the punishment. These sensational pictures are the type that stir up fanatical ministers like the Rev. Lang S. Ford, of Chicago, perhaps not without some cause. While I am not a reformist, yet I believe in catering to public opinion, and my idea of the big percentage of the American public is that they will go and enjoy pictures in which questionable morals are portrayed, yet their reasoning decency makes them vote that such pictures should not be shown without a moral. Continuation of such stuff will in time create agitation against moving picture shows, making it hard on the exhibitor, and kill the goose that laid the golden egg for the manufacturer. I think more thought should be given to the detail moral of a picture without cutting out the sensation or making it too mushy, and the remedy should be applied before agitation gets dangerous.

"Yours very truly, W. CLARKE,
"Prop. Rockford Moving Picture Parlor, Rockford, Ill."

There is good sense in Mr. Clarke's remarks, and he, for one, should be gratified with the work the censors have done. Is he any better pleased with the programs that have been sent out the past few weeks? There is a class, however, who are not so well pleased and say that the "ginger has gone out of the show." The man who tries to please everybody courts failure.

The Modern Way in Moving Picture Making.

CHAPTER VII.

The Developing Room.

It stands to reason that what was said in a previous chapter, as to the cleanliness required in handling a film before exposure, applies with equal force to its manipulation in the developing room; therefore, it is unnecessary to repeat it. The same remark applies to the safety of the light. Most films in the process of development are wound on drums which are revolved through successive baths of developing, washing, fixing, and final washing solutions, before being wound on a drying drum, from which, when thoroughly dried, they are taken, preparatory to being reeled and sent out for use. Now, between the developing and the drying the most important part of the work is done, and if it be not attended to with the minutest exactitude, the picture will be faulty in some respects, and then all the labor will have been in vain. When we consider for a moment that prior to the development of this few 100 feet of sensitized celluloid, an expenditure of many hundreds and perhaps thousands of dollars has gone to waste, it demands very little insistence to urge the importance—the vital importance—of concentrating all possible care and attention on the successful development of the negative. For in most cases the act or scene cannot be photographed again, and if it can, only at a very great expense.

Let us follow the passage of the film from the developing tank to the drying drum, and endeavor to realize the care that must be taken. It goes without saying that the film must be wound evenly, edge to edge, on the flat frames or drum. This is generally made of some kind of thin metal. Sometimes the circumference is formed by separate sections, so that the picture can be seen through while it is being developed. When all the film is wound upon it, the drum should be lowered into the developing solution and mechanically revolved in the latter until the image has attained proper printing density. The developing troughs should be spotlessly clean, and the solution in it should be filtered and free from all dust particles. Moreover, it should be of an even temperature, as that of the surrounding apartment—say from 65° to 70°. If you lower the temperature, you slow the action of the developer; if you raise the temperature, you hasten the action. Hence the urgency of having the temperature at a fixed point, so that the developer may act constantly and regularly. When development is complete, the film should be well washed, either in plain or acidulated water. Some workers prefer to use common hydrochloric acid in very dilute solution. It stops developing action and clears the film, which is then ready for the hypo solution. This, again, may either be of the plain or acid kind. Whichever it is, it should be filtered and not allowed to become too weak by excessive use. Fixation is generally complete in about fifteen minutes. After fixation another wash of fifteen minutes, and, though this is not essential, the passage of the film through a bath of glycerine for a few minutes may be adopted. Finally, after a last wash, the film is wound edge to edge on the drying drum, secured taut with push pins, and either allowed to dry spontaneously or by rapid revolution of the drum. As the film is revolved, it is a good plan to go over its surface with a pledget of moistened absorbent cotton, so as to remove particles of dust or any other impurities that may have gathered on the gelatine. The reader will notice that I lay repeated stress on the danger of dust and dirt. These are deadly darkroom enemies to successful negative making. Every possible precaution should be taken to keep out dust. Before work, it should be filtered out, swept out, fanned out; everything done to prevent its appearance in the room when developing is taking place. The clothing and the hands of the darkroom staff should be scrupulously clean. So must the developing, washing, fixing troughs. Smoking should be prohibited in the room. A negative developing room is the most important part of the whole moving picture installation. There should be a most rigid set of rules as regards cleanliness. Any infraction of them should be punishable, as upon the absolute purity of the negative depends its final success as a picture. If the film be allowed to dry in a stationary position, a drip will collect at the bottom of the drum, which should be carefully drained off. I have said that the temperature of the room should be constant, and that, also, means should be taken to prevent it getting humid. A current of cool air should, if possible, be kept constantly passing through it. All air which obtains access to the room should be filtered through clean fabric, as is done in dry plate factories, so as to keep out dust. I know that many readers will think that these little points are in the nature of ultra refinements, but their observance is necessary in the production of first-class work. Then, again, the developing troughs are best not made of iron or other metal, but rather of porcelain, which is chemically a most innocuous substance. Iron has a tendency to corrode under the action of the developing and hypo solutions, the effects of which will be described in the next chapter. What I have endeavored to do in this one is to give some common sense ideas as to how the films should be handled in development. Next week I shall describe some of the defects due to faulty development and other causes.

A visitor from the other side of the Rockies, in whose company we made a tour of the New York shows, made some comments which the proprietors of some of these places would not like to see in print. One remark made was that in the large Eastern cities it seemed to be all outside show. Make the most alluring displays and blast of trumpet to get the people inside and then give the poorest show possible to chase them out again. No doubt this is practised to some extent on thoroughfares that depend upon transient trade, but where a steady patronage is looked for, the following tip from a successful Western exhibitor is good for any section of the country: "Get the best operator you can find. Give him everything necessary to produce the very best pictures, even to a good salary. Then conduct your house as it should be and watch your bank account grow." There are many houses in the East, some even in New York City, that are conducted along these lines, and they are the ones that will still be doing business when the others are passed away and forgotten.

The sign in front of Miner's Theater, "We show only uncensored films here," is a sample of mild sarcasm and also shows that the manager is bright enough to seize on a clever advertising dodge, and no doubt one that will appeal to his clientele.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

By F. H. Richardson, Chicago.

CHAPTER III.

As has been stated, the tendency of electric current is to reach the earth, exactly as steam confined in a boiler seeks to reach the open air. What the air is to steam the earth is to electricity. I have therefore sought to impress upon you the importance of thorough insulation and have told you that the higher the pressure (voltage) the greater the necessity for perfect insulation.

All wires used in inside work, and most of those used for outside as well, are covered with either rubber, gutta-percha or a fibrous covering saturated with an insulating compound. Such wires may touch DRY wood without likelihood of danger but, on general principles, should not be allowed to. Wires should never, under any circumstances, be allowed to come in contact with metal which has any kind of connection with the earth or which reaches (as the iron sheeting of an operating room) from one wire of a circuit to the other. In saying that wires should not be allowed to touch metal the writer is fully aware that modern electrical wiring allows of, in fact, in some cities, requires that wires be encased in metal tubing, both wires of a circuit being placed in the same tube. There are technical reasons why this is not injurious. There are, by the close proximity of the wires to each other and to the conduit, induced currents when alternating is used but one current neutralizes the other so that, as a matter of fact, this induced current is not recorded by the meter nor does any reach the earth by way of the conduit, unless the wire insulation and conduit insulation is imperfect allowing actual contact between a raw wire and the metal of the conduit. A technical explanation of the reasons for this would be beyond even the average electrician and will therefore not be given. Suffice to say this is the fact.

It is best to keep the wires of a circuit not less than 2½ inches or 3 inches apart. The insulating knobs may be fastened to the wall or ceiling either by nails or suitable screws. If nails are used cut out a circular piece of heavy leather ½ to ¾ inch in diameter and drive the nail through it first. This acts as a cushion and you can drive the nail down tight on the head of the insulator without breaking the porcelain. Allow your wires to come into contact with absolutely nothing but the insulators except as hereafter related. To pass wires through a wall or floor get some hard rubber insulating tubing from an electrical supply house. Bore a hole as large as the outside diameter of the tubing through the wall or floor, being certain that the tubing will go over the insulated wire. Run your wire through the hole and slip on the tubing, shoving it into the hole so that it projects slightly on either side. Pull the wire tight and fasten it, then wrap insulating tape tightly around the end of the tubing and wire on both sides of the wall to prevent its slipping out of place. Porcelain tubes may be used instead of hard rubber if desired (see Fig. 2).

If the wall be of brick take a piece of gas-pipe and file saw teeth notches around the circumference of one end. Using this as a drill you will be astonished how soon you can pierce a hole through the wall.

Bear in mind that this work is not designed to make a lineman of you but merely to give sufficient direction that you may be able to run a circuit properly should circumstances be such that it be necessary. On the road an operator is called upon to do a great many stunts and frequently if he can't do them circumstances are such that they cannot be done at all. Moreover, I wish to enable the operator or manager to, from the directions given, be able to form at least an intelligent opinion as to whether their wiring is being, or has been, properly done.

Your wires should be selected by reference to the wire and lamp current consumption tables which appear a little further on. It is generally stated that "a 16 c.p. incandescent lamp consumes ½ ampere of current." This, you will see by reference to the lamp consumption table, is very wrong, applying only to 110-volt lamps.

To figure the size of wire necessary in circuits you proceed as follows: Supposing we have 110-volt current and wish to install a circuit to carry ten 16 candle-power lamps. By reference to the lamp consumption table we find that each 110-volt 16 c.p. lamp will require ½ ampere of current, or a total of five amperes. By reference to the wire table we discover that a No. 16 rubber covered wire will carry six amperes, leaving a one-ampere margin, so we select this size. A No. 18 weatherproof wire would carry the required current but the underwriter's rules forbid anything smaller than a No. 16 wire being used on inside work.

In using this table we must remember, however, that it applies for SHORT LEADS ONLY (see Table No. 3). As the length of a wire increases its total resistance increases, so that a No. 16 wire would not convey six amperes of current for a long distance without drop in voltage due to resistance. If the lead be long a larger size must be used for a portion of the distance. In other words, if your lead be a long one, it will be necessary to use, for a portion of the distance, a size of wire capable of carrying something more than the amperage indicated in the table, else there will be "drop" of voltage and your lamps will not burn up to candle power.

The following table gives the current allowance by the National Board of Fire Underwriters for various sizes copper wire, figured on a non-heating basis and, with due allowance made for long leads, it will meet every requirement of either the operator or the electrician.

Browne & Sharpe Gauge.	Rubber Covered Wire. Amperes.	Weatherproof Wire. Amperes.
No. 18	3	5
No. 16	6	8
No. 14	12	16
No. 12	17	23
No. 10	24	32
No. 8	33	40
No. 6	46	65
No. 5	54	77
No. 4	65	92
No. 3	76	110
No. 2	90	131
No. 1	107	156
No. 0	127	185
No. 00	150	220
No. 000	177	262

NOTE.—The discrepancy in allowance between rubber covered and weatherproof wire is not that one will not carry just as much current as the other, but arises from the fact that the least heating will cause gradual deterioration of rubber insulation. Wire with rubber insulation is therefore rated very low in current carrying capacity.

LAMP CONSUMPTION TABLE.

This table is compiled from actual tests made with standard lamps and it will be found to be approximately correct. Used in conjunction with the wire table even the novice may figure out what size wire to use for any incandescent circuit not exceeding seventy-five feet in length.

Voltage.	Candle Power.	Amperes.	Watts.
52	16	1.04	54.1
52	32	2.08	108.2
100	16	.64	64.0
100	32	1.28	128.0
110	16	.58	64.0
110	32	1.16	128.0

Where 8 c.p. lamps are used in decoration two of them equal one 16 c.p. lamp in current consumption.

Light frosted or ground glass globes reduce the illuminating power of incandescent lamps by about 12 per cent. The average life of an incandescent lamp is about 800 hours of use. Many will burn much longer and some much less, but this is the average. Old lamps are poor economy in a theater, as they burn dim and destroy the illumination.

TABLE NO. 3.

This table will be found of much use in conjunction with Table No. 1. As has been said, there is drop in voltage in long leads, due to resistance. This table gives the data in this connection so far as it will be likely to be of the least use to the theater man or operator.

Voltage			Wire No. Browne & Sharpe Gauge.
292	625	1247	14
370	780	1586	13
473	1000	1957	12
602	1252	2499	11
749	1575	3175	10
940	1984	3976	9
1186	2542	5012	8
1500	3162	6355	7
2387	5100	10110	5

To use this table multiply the distance in feet from the point of departure to the end of the circuit by the number of amperes you wish to use on the circuit. Look in the table under the voltage heading corresponding to the voltage of your lines and find the number nearest to the product you have obtained by the multiplication. Opposite this, in the right-hand column, will be found the size of wire necessary to carry this current with 3 per cent. loss.

A FIREPROOF REWINDER.

There has been for some time a demand upon the part of insurance companies and others interested in safety devices for moving picture theaters and exchanges for a fireproof rewinding device which will handle the film while it is being examined and rewound without danger of ignition. It is therefore of interest to record at this time the fact that a safety fireproof rewinder has recently been placed on the market by Messrs. Williams, Brown & Earle, of Philadelphia. This rewinder is so arranged that the film is contained in fireproof boxes with fire valves, so that even should the portion of the film which is exposed during the examination, become ignited, the fire valves would at once extinguish the fire.

This rewinder has recently been submitted to the Underwriters and to the police departments in many of the large cities and is endorsed and recommended by them. Much of the danger in the handling of film comes from a possible igniting of the film during the rewinding and examining. This is now entirely avoided.

The rewinder is made in several designs and is especially adapted for the use of either the exhibitor or the exchange. The magazines containing the film are supplied with automatic self-closing doors, with brake attachment for controlling the free running reel, and are so arranged that the operation of the machine is entirely from one side, so that it can be placed on a bracket against the wall as well as on the edge of a table, a matter of great convenience, especially in confined situations or where space is limited.

OBSERVATIONS BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

So Laemmle has recanted! It is now a settled fact that he is not working under a license of the Motion Picture Patents Company. He is out—there is no evidence that he is "down and out"—but he is out; and, I understand, upon his own initiative. It would hardly be fair to other worthy renters who are also "out" to say that the "going" of Mr. Laemmle carries with it a stronger significance than did the exit of others. It must be acknowledged that no film renter in the business believed in and more liberally used printers' ink than Mr. Laemmle, and none in the business had more film rental exchanges than he had, but at the same time he was a unit. Yet the course of Mr. Laemmle has a peculiar significance. He and Swanson were the kingpins in the point of enterprise. As advertisers they had no peers. Whether or not the advertising did them any good is best attested by the books of the film manufacturers. No adverse reports as to their credit are afloat even at this date. The least that can be said is that when Swanson and Laemmle dropped, the licensed people lost two good, energetic men. The significance attached to Laemmle's dropping out is this: His first intention was to stand by his Chicago colleagues and go with the Independents. Upon mature reflection he decided to stand by "the old guard" and he enrolled himself under the banner of the Patents Company. Now, after an experience of about ten weeks, he takes on the sackcloth and ashes and retreats to the fold he first had in view. Why is it? I have drained every quarter to get at a true solution, but to this day I am in the dark. Those who should know refuse to speak. Those who can speak refuse to hear. Laemmle himself gives the only answer in his advertisements. He says: "No more licenses. No more worry." Taking his own public declaration, it can be fairly assumed that the film renters and the rental exchanges of the West are against the license system, and, after about ten weeks of conscientious work, Laemmle has concluded that, as self-preservation is the first law of nature, he had only one alternative—to join the Independents. I know Laemmle personally, and I know he has many warm friends in the ranks he deserted. I know that some force that overcame his personal convictions prompted the step he took. What was that force? Surely not selfishness. No one will charge that to him, for all in the business know that, like Swanson, he was in the ranks of the foremost, with both money and energy, to help all movements looking to the betterment of the motion picture business. No pretension is made that because Swanson, the Twentieth Century Optiscope Company, Laemmle and others have renounced the Motion Picture Patents Company agreement or license the business is going to the dogs, or that the Patents Company is going out of business. Such an assumption is unjustifiable in the light of experience and matters of record. It must be remembered that Chicago is the hotbed of opposition to anything that bears a license—a Patents Company license. All the leading film exchanges of that city are on record as to that. But why? Why is it that Swanson, Laemmle and the Twentieth Century Optiscope Company, the recognized leaders of the Film Service Association of last year renounce the Patents Company after having operated under its license? Mr. Swanson has volunteered a public statement as to his position. Well, all moving picture men know that Swanson frequently became enthusiastic when ventilating his views. His energy frequently taps the think pot of readers. His views are not discredited, but at no time more than the present would the calm, unbiased views of others who have joined hands with him be more opportune. As the case stands at present the real trouble seems to rest on the license question. If such is the case, we cannot hope for an early truce. Those who have renounced the license proposition are looking for business and the Patents Company is looking for the revenue—so there you are.

Reliable information received from the West justifies the prediction that within a short time the list of licensed film renters will be still further decreased. This information carries with it the assertion that the Patents Company is not "making good" outside the collection of royalties. More than that, film exchanges throughout the country are losing business. Complaints are flowing in from all quarters.

The chief complaint against the Patents Company appears to be that it has not stood upon its patents. Rumors are afloat that such steps are ripening. Every day these steps are deferred tends to weaken the hopes of those who have been loyal. The collection of royalties is not the main object of the Patents Company, as many seem to think. A return for the royalties paid is the point. Considerable stress has been laid by some upon the fact that the Patents Company has maintained a representative at Albany to look after the interests of certain bills in behalf of the moving picture people. This is a good move, but the royalties are being expended in this direction in behalf of the Independents as well as those who go down in their pockets. Something should be done to protect the men who are paying the royalties. If a man paying two dollars a week for the privilege of using licensed films finds that his next-door neighbor is getting the use of the same films without the payment of a royalty he is liable to suffer a severe attack of indignation. Replevin proceedings are all right so far as they go, but that is in the nature of a punishment. Why not provide something in the form of a preventative? Why is it that independent film exchanges are supplying their customers with licensed subjects almost as soon as the men who pay rolalties receive them? Why is it that the independent film exchanges advertise and make good on the declaration that they can supply all makes of films—licensed or unlicensed? That is what the exhibitor wants to know, and that is what was put up to me in every licensed place I visited during the past week.

I sometimes yearn to be a Rip Van Winkle. I would like to go upon some mountain, fall asleep and forget the moving picture business for twenty years. This impulse more particularly seized me a short time ago when I attended a meeting of the Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York. How my mind dwelt upon the parable about a house being divided against itself! I have persistently urged those outside the organization to get into it, and yet at a recent meeting I found a state of affairs that caused me mortification. I heard men claiming credit for doing this and that, and others making claim to credit for the same thing; I heard charges of default in payment of dues and listened to the claims of those paid in advance. Such a state of affairs should not exist. Get together, gentlemen, and work in harmony. Not only that, but work together for organization. Appoint committees to canvass territories and bring into the fold men who should be with you.

From all accounts, Long Green still holds sway at Albany. According to the information at hand, the proposed bill to stop all amusements on Sundays was framed at the instance of the stage hands employed in the theaters of Greater New York, and the icy barrier with which the bill was met would make the ice gorge at Niagara Falls look like a pimple on a watermelon. Information at hand also leads to the conclusion that, owing to an absence of the required lubricating material, the bill which raises the moving picture license from $25 to $250, with a proviso that exhibitions may be given between certain hours on Sundays, will also go upon the shelf of forgetfulness. The later bill, however, is meeting with much opposition on the part of exhibitors, who declare that it is unjust to ask places charging but five cents admission to pay a license of $250 per year, while houses charging one dollar, and as high as five dollars, pay but $500.

Time and again I have been asked during the past week whether or not the Board of Censors and the licensed manufacturers are working in harmony. I made this quite clear in one of my recent letters, but to dispel any misunderstanding will add "sure enough." I might also add that to get closer to the situation the Censors have asked the manufacturers to enter into a written agreement that they will not put out any film or part of a film that is not approved. Some developmens are more funny than many that appear on the films. I have not heard what the Censors agree to do, but my informant tells me that all they are required to do is to sit down and look on. I guess that's about right.

OLIVER.

The Italo-American Film Exchange is a new exchange which has recently opened for business at No. 138 Third avenue, New York City, under the management of Morris Levy, who was former manager of the Knickerbocker Film Exchange. It is the intention of this company to handle a large selection of high-class Independent films by the principal European manufacturers. Mr. Levy is busy framing up contracts for a steady supply of suitable subjects.

MOTION PICTURE PATENTS COMPANY

THEIR POLICY AND PROCEDURE.

The Celluloid Risks Bill Amended.

The Motion Picture Patents Company brought about, through its representative, Mr. Chester Beecroft, the amendment of Bill No. 618.

This bill if passed in its original form would have meant the death of a business in which millions of dollars are invested.

The following letter, written by Mr. C. F. Murphy, Chairman of the Committee on Codes, by Mr. Beecroft, was the direct cause of the amendment of this bill, and thereby accomplished for the motion picture business at large more good than has ever before been attained by any corporation or individual:

"Mr. C. F. Murphy,
Chairman Committee on Codes,
New York Legislature, Albany, N. Y.

"Dear Sir: I beg to call your attention to Bill No. 1600, introduced by Mr. Coughlan on March 25th, and referred to the Committee on Codes.

"This bill seeks to make the use of celluloid films a misdemeanor. The patents now applied to motion picture machines render it absolutely impossible for a film to burn, excepting a space of about two inches directly in front of the lens. The possibility of even this small space catching fire is most remote, as machines are fixed now, and amounts to about as much fire as that caused by the igniting of a parlor match.

"We will be glad to demonstrate this matter before your Committee, or any member thereof, at any time, and most strongly recommend that the Codes Committee does not report the bill favorably, as its passage would mean the death of a business in which millions of dollars are invested, and in which millions of people are interested. Anything affecting the motion picture is particularly a blow at the poor man and the children, to whom the five-cent rate of admission is a tremendous boon. Most sincerely yours,

"CHESTER BEECROFT."

The bill, which in its original form read as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK.
No. 618. Int. 574.
IN SENATE.
March 8, 1909.

Introduced by Mr. Cullen; read twice and ordered printed, and when printed to be committed to the Committee on Codes.

AN ACT

TO AMEND THE PENAL LAW, IN RELATION TO MOVING PICTURE EXHIBITIONS.

The People of the State of New York, represented in the Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

Section 1. Article one hundred and seventy-two of chapter of the lows of nineteen hundred and nine, entitled "An act providing for the punishment of crime, constituting chapter forty of the consolidated laws," is hereby amended by adding at the end a new section, to be section nineteen hundred and fourteen, and to read as follows:

1914. Use of celluloid films in moving picture apparatus prohibited.—The use of celluloid films in any machine, apparatus or device whereby moving pictures are exhibited to the public is prohibited. Any person who shall knowingly operate, or permit to be operated in his behalf, any such machine, apparatus or device equipped with celluloid films in violation of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars, or both.

This act shall take effect immediately.

was amended to read:

Bill No. 618, introduced by Mr. Cullen, Article 172 in Chapter 88 of Laws of 1909, entitled "An act Providing for the Punishment of Crime" constituting Chapter 40 of the consolidated laws, to read as follows:

No. 1914. "The use of films in picture machines, apparatus or device, whereby moving pictures are exhibited to the public, is prohibited unless they are absolutely fireproof or so far fireproof as incapable of independently maintaining combustion after once being lighted.

"Any person who so knowingly operates or permits to be operated in his behalf such machine, apparatus or device, which is equipped with film in violation of this section, shall be guilty of misdemeanor.

(Section 2.) "This act shall take effect October 1, 1909." and was in this form reported to the Senate.

Mr. C. F. Murphy, Chairman of Codes Committee, in a conversation with Mr. Beecroft recently, said: "I am positive that none of the various bills on Sunday closing now pending will come up for hearing this year, and I do not consider it likely that they come up next year either."

Mayor McClellan Won Over.

Chester Beecroft, representing the Motion Picture Patents Company, recently had a conference with Mayor McClellan and Francis V. Oliver, Chief of the License Bureau of New York. The Patents Company is anxious to have this city so frame its licenses as to compel the picture theaters to be kept light during and between shows. Mr. Beecroft stated that he had perfected a system of lighting that allows the house lights to be left full on without affecting the pictures in the least. He argues that the light theater would eliminate the possibility of panic and the offensive conduct of degenerates who sometimes take advantage of the darkness. "With the pictures approved by the Censorship Board, and the theaters light and safe, the picture show is the ideal amusement of the masses, and we ask the co-operation of the authorities in our effort to make the theaters light," said Mr. Beecroft. Both the Mayor and Mr. Oliver expressed approval of the scheme, which consists of amber and green colored lights and a cardboard shield, and it is likely that within the next few days the light theater will be compulsory.

THE MOVING PICTURE IN EUROPE AND AMERICA.

(Important Interview with I. W. Ullman.)

Mr. I. W. Ullman, of the Film Import and Trading Company, of 145 East Twenty-third street, recently returned from a prolonged visit to Europe; in the course of which he got in touch with the leading sources of moving picture supplies. We were desirous of ascertaining Mr. Ullman's impressions, and having been succesful in doing so, they are here set down for the information of the readers of The World. Mr. Ullman is particularly well qualified to give an opinion on the international status of the moving picture, because of his position as a very large importer, and the fact that this is not the first time that he has traveled Europe, in connection with the importation of moving pictures.

One of the first questions we asked Mr. Ullman was to give us some idea of the relative position of the moving picture produced in various countries in respect of qualitative character—in other words, which country made the best pictures? According to our authority, and we are bound to say that we agree with him, England is not, by any means, as far advanced as she might be. The insularity and conservatism of the people operates against the production of moving picture plays by English firms which are acceptable by the people of other countries. In pure technique the English firms stand well; dramatically and scenically the pictures still leave much to be desired. But there are signs that the English manufacturers are waking up to the needs of the situation, both as regards the quality of the picture and the commercial way of handling them.

Mr. Ullman went to Spain, and he found the haughty Spaniard to be somewhat lethargic in this respect. He is a great patron of the moving picture, but has much to learn in regard to its commercial exploitation. In Russia moving pictures are highly popular. Being a poor man's entertainment and the Russian peasant being very poor, moving pictures appear at an opportune time. Italy and Germany, in Mr. Ullman's opinion, show the moving picture in its highest form of development in Europe. The theaters are numerous and well patronized, and as a form of entertainment it has caught on with the people. One or two French makers have long been held up in this country as the standard of comparison in the making of moving picture films, but, in Mr. Ullman's opinion, and he is certainly a most competent judge, the Italian work, both dramatically and scenically, is ahead of that of the French film makers. This is an opinion which we think will be generally shared in. France, too, in the commercial handling of the moving picture proposition, is not as far advanced as she ought to be. With such large American and European experience, the answer to the question which we next put to Mr. Ullman, will, we are assured, be received with respect by our readers. What we asked was his opinion of the future of the moving picture.

"I believe," was the reply in the well-known phrase, "it has come to stay. It is the poor man's entertainment; it is of great educational value; it is part of the national life. Better classes of people are patronizing it than was the case two years ago; the work both technically and dramatically has also greatly improved. There is an increasing appreciation for good class films." This question naturally lead Mr. Ullman by easy stages back from his Ulyssean wanderings to "his own, his native heath."

"About this censorship, Mr. Ullman?"

"Well, I believe the censorship will be and has been carried out in a broad minded principle of common sense and intelligence. By and by, of course, there will be no need for a censorship, because the manufacturers will know what the public want and will profit by it. And it will have this value in that the New York censorship will be generally accepted throughout the United States. It would have been a misfortune if every little hamlet throughout the country had erected its own censorship. The members of the censorship committee are in touch with the needs of the people and they will only cut out that which is undesirable. For example, while they would not tolerate crime or sin in a picture, yet where it is necessary to show it in order to develop or illustrate a story, of course it naturally passes. On the whole, I think the censorship makes for the betterment of the moving picture. Mr. Collier is a very bright and earnest man, and I think the good work he is doing will be generally appreciated."

It having been stated that there is a tendency or a desire in certain quarters to restrict the exhibition of licensed film to those houses which do not put on vaudeville, we sought Mr. Ullman's opinion on this point.

"I am in favor of the exclusion of vaudeville," he replied, "because if it be shown, then the small moving picture theater will be closed, and the number of houses thereby will be largely reduced. It stands to reason that the big man who can afford to put on vaudeville with his moving pictures must crowd out the little man, so you will deminish the number of houses and limit the film output. I think the elimination of vaudeville from moving picture houses will tend to increase the latter."

Sliding Scale for Renters.

There was one subject raised by Mr. Ullman in the course of this very interesting conversation which we think should be ventilated for the information and benefit of all, and that is, the attitude of the renter or exchange man towards the manufacturer. "The renter in many cases is unreasonable. The feature film spoils him. He thinks that it is a hardship to pay a good average price for a manufacturer's output and to average up the commonplace subject with the feature films. If he did his duty to the manufacturer he would impress upon the exhibitor the necessity of accepting a service in which the highest grade of film was sandwiched in between the ordinary kind at a fair average price. Clearly the best must be taken with the second best. If the latter is also rejected or cast aside or laid on the shelf or refused then a point may be reached when the importer or manufacturer is not able to do business at a profit. A manufacturer or an importer very properly looks for the support of the renter or exchange man, as without that support he cannot progress. "Therefore," argues Mr. Ullman, and the argument strikes us as sound, "the policy of the renter should be to support the exhibitor and the manufacturer in a fair average price of film and not to set up tactics of discrimination." We commend this aspect of importation trade, subject to the attention of the renters.

We are pleased to have had this agreeable and informative talk with Mr. Ullman on the international moving picture situation, and we think that our readers, by persuing the foregoing account of it, will derive many a useful hint from what such a respected authority has to tell them on the subject of his experience abroad and the impressions he has formed from them.

Williamsport, Pa.—William H. Amer has secured the management of the Summer park at Vallamont asd promises a first-class line of attractions. He has secured a license from the Patents Company and intends to show only the best films made by the worlds' best artists.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

The "Observations" of your Man About Town are full of sound sense. Last week he quoted the manufacturers as complaining that they could not get good sketches and other subjects for film plays. Then he goes on to point out that good writers will not accept the paltry remuneration offered them for high-class work. The latter is true. The manufacturers can get the pick of the dramatic and literary market if they will pay the price and study, or pay somebody else to study, that market and what it has to offer. It is all a question of supply and demand. The supply exists; the demand doesn't—at any rate in the United States. They manage these things differently and better in London, Paris and Rome.

There is a week's work—maybe two or three—in the writing of a moving picture play. If it is a good one would it be dear at $250? No, it would be cheap. Clyde Fitch wouldn't do the work for that money; nor would any of the French, Italian and English dramatists. It is only in America, the alleged land of high pay for good brains, that you hear of $10 and $20 being offered for sketches by the manufacturers of "perfect" films. What is the result? Men who would have made a special study of dramatic writing for film subjects have turned their energies in other and more profitable directions. This is not hearsay. I know it for a fact. So do others.

Much the same may be said of the more technical end of the work. Good producers are rare, because they are not properly encouraged by adequate pay. And that's a fact. So are the photographers rare; those who take the pictures and develop the negatives and positives. The talent employed is often of mediocre quality. I know. I have seen it at work. I have "sized it up." I have tried and tested it. What it does not know about the work is considerable. Yet they are alleged to turn out "perfect" films. They don't. They can't. They won't—until they get down to a proper understanding of the work, as it is being described week by week in these pages.

The poor operator comes in for some rough treatment at times; the photographer, so far, has been allowed to escape; so has the playwriter and the producer. All these are in as dire need of reformation as the operator. They have my sympathy; they will earn my praise if they will do better work, and get it legitimately entitled to the proud title of "perfect." I saw a film last week in which the producer had lamentably failed in his work. At one part of the story the characters wandered about quite aimlessly; the action had halted; the producer had slurred over the passage; result on the audience: mystification and dissatisfaction.

I saw another film—a quite recent release and therefore a "perfect" one—which told a pointless story that, however, made the audience laugh by its absurdity, but nevertheless left people wondering why the thing was done at all. Another subject pretended to have an historical basis. No clew was given the audience as to the period of history shown. They couldn't guess. How can they? American audiences don't carry universal histories in their pockets when they go to moving picture theaters. Why should they? The moving picture is not supposed to be an enigma. Its aim is to entertain and amuse. The i's must be dotted and the t's crossed and nothing left to doubt.

So you see, boys and girls, men and women and fellows, it all comes to this: Your morality censorship will be no good at all by itself. It may sift out the undesirable, but who will sift in the good? Messrs. Collier & Co.? No. Not all the combined intellect of Nos. 80 and 96 Fifth avenue. The manufacturers must do this part of the business themselves. They must get those suitable subjects. They must pay for them. They won't get them otherwise. They can be got in France, Italy and England. Why not in America? Surely they need not be imported—just as Mr. Murdock is importing the films?

The unfortunate part of the business is that the heads of the various manufacturing companies do not or will not take a direct personal interest in the quality of the work that is made. There is an absence of that close supervision which is essential to success all through the system. It is too often departmentalized so effectively that when the work is pieced together it presents the appearance of patchwork. In very few films that are shown can evidence be discerned of a master mind running through the production. How different with some stage plays and other works of art? In these the personality of the man who conceived the work is evident in the result. Ever see that in a moving picture? Not often. No reason why you shouldn't.

THE BOARD OF CENSORSHIP.

The Board of Censorship of Motion Picture Programmes announce that all manufacturers, or their representatives, producing pictures for the New York market have signed an agreement containing the following provisions:

All film intended for New York will be shown to the Board of Censorship at least a week in advance of issue. All changes desired by the Board of Censorship will be made and no picture condemned by the Board will be released for the New York market. The agreement may be abrogated by either party on a two-weeks' notice.

The Board of Censorship further states: "The agreement merely confirms an existing fact. Censorship has now been going on for nearly a month and the manufacturers have co-operated in the frankest spirit. All changes suggested by the Board have been made.

"The signing of the agreement means that the censorship has passed its experimental stage. There can be no dispute that moving pictures are on the upward road. The time may well come that the Censorship Board will find much of its work taken out of its hands by the manufacturers, who will cease to produce the occasional doubtful picture that has done harm in the past. Immense possibilities lie before moving pictures on the up-building and constructive side, and it is here that the most important work of the Censorship Board will be done.

"The campaign looking toward improved vaudeville and better physical conditions in moving picture shows will be pushed ahead rapidly. The city is being districted and local committees will take up the work of inspection. In this we will have the co-operation of the city authorities, the Association of Exhibitors, the Motion Picture Patents Company and the other groups of manufacturers, and of various civic organizations."

NOTES FROM CANADA.

The Bennett Theatrical Enterprises of London, Ont., have sold their Halifax, N. S., house to Fred H. Trifts, of St. John, N. B., who was formerly manager of the Bennett Unique in St. John and later had charge of their Halifax house. Mr. Trifts is a well-known figure in the M. P. business in the lower provinces, one of the best operators in Canada.

Halifax, N. S., two years ago had no M. P. theaters; to-day there are seven houses doing S. R. O. business. Several started up only to go down again. The survivors are:

"Nickel" (Keith house, M. V. Gastonguay, mgr.).—M. P., ill. songs and one vaudeville act; seating capacity about 700; Association service.

"Unique" (Fred H. Trifts, prop. and mgr.).—M. P. and ill. songs; seating capacity 250; Association service.

"Ackers" (Leonard Acker, prop. and mgr.).—Five vaudeville acts and M. P.; seating capacity 750.

"Star" (W. Webber, lessee and mgr.).—Pictures and vaudeville; seating capacity 450; mixed service.

"King dward" (Fred H. Trifts, mgr.).—M. P., songs and vaudeville; seating capacity 600; Association service.

"Orpheus Hall" (Jas. Gault, lessee and mgr.).—Vaudeville, songs and pictures; seating capacity 600; mixed service.

"Empire" (H. Redden, mgr. and lessee).—Vaudeville, song, pictures; seating capacity 800; Independent service.

THE "HALLBERG" ECONOMIZERS.

A large number of "Hallberg" Automatic Electric Economizers have been installed during the past few months, among which a few may be mentioned: Wilmer & Vincent's Colonial Theater, Richmond, Va., where a 220-volt direct current "Hallberg" Economizer is saving over 70 per cent. on the moving picture lamp current bill. A similar Economizer has been put in the Four-Paw Theater at Philadelphia. 110-volt direct-current Economizers, saving 50 per cent. on electric bills, have been installed in the Pictureland Theater, 645 Penn street, Reading, Pa.; at Proctor's Theater, Elizabeth, N. J., and also for the E. H. Martin Telephone Company, Webster City, Ia.

The "Hallberg" alternating current Economizer, saving 65 to 90 per cent. on the bill, is the standard current saver, approved by all operators who know. Among a few recent important installations, where perfect moving picture light and greatest saving won out, a few may be mentioned: F. F. Proctor's Bijou Dreams (5 Economizers); Pearce & Scheck, Baltimore (12 Economizers); Interstate Amusement Company, Washington, D. C.; A. W. McIntosh, Waterloo, Ia.; D. C. Scott, Anaconda, Mont. (6 Economizers); Col. J. A. McCurry, Rocky Ford, Colo, and hundreds of others

The "Hallberg" Economizers have been on the market for about two years, and are giving excellent satisfaction the world over.

A NEW SUMMER THEATER FOR SAPULPA, OKLA.

A new Summer vaudeville house will be erected on Main street by Geo. B. Thompson, formerly proprietor of the Vaudette moving picture show of that city. The house will have a capacity of 1,000. The building will be 30 x 140. The stage will be one of the finest in the State and the dressing rooms a boon to the vaudeville artists, having hot and cold running water in each.

WEEKLY COMMENTS ON THE SHOWS.

By Our Own Critic.

Here we have the beau ideal of the suburban moving picture theater in "The Ideas" situated at 110th street and Fifth avenue, New York City. I discovered the existence of this theater quite by accident, and I am very glad I did so, because it enables me to direct the attention of the readers of the World to what may be done in the way of especially erected moving picture theaters in the outskirts of a great city. "The Ideas" stands on its own ground, and is detached from other buildings. It is handsomely and solidly built; has a pleasant facade, and all the attributes of attracting a good class of patrons.

I went in the afternoon and found myself surrounded by nice mannered children and a few elders, eating candies. Quite a family sort of gathering. The charge in the afternoon was five cents, in the evening it is ten. I understand that "The Ideas" is a very successful type of moving picture theater.

I was very glad to notice that the sombre and gruesome were absent from the screen. The film illustrating the Biblical story of the Nativity and its attendant incidents was respectfully received, showing that an audience is always favorably inclined towards sacred subjects if they are properly handled. This "Star of Bethlehem" is a very well conceived theme, and it is so splendidly staged and carried out that it deserves special praise. The scene illustrating the Nativity is beautifully shown, the actress who impersonates Mary, especially fine. But the birth of the Redeemer probably did not take place amongst such luxurious surroundings as the producer of the picture would have us think. Christian art says one thing, Christian fact says another, and the fact of the matter was that the birth took place in a manger in a stable.

I am a little in doubt as to whether the Harlemites quite understood the real meaning of the Pathe film which showed how Paul decided to marry and the consequences of his decision. I am surprised that the censors passed such a subject, although on the surface it is all right. Paul has a belle amie, and having decided to marry, he incautiously leaves a letter stating the fact on the ground which mademoiselle sees. So Paul's party celebrating the close of his bachelordom is turned by the rejected girl into a perfect orgy, which eventuates in Paul being placed in the "lock-up" for the night. The next morning on his release the bride and her father appear, and the "woman scorned" triumphs over the discomfiture of the faithless swain. However, with truly French adaptability to circumstances the bride takes her lover to her arms, and off they go to be married. Not a particularly edifying story, is it, Mr. Collier? Another Pathe subject illustrated the legend of the "Forget-me-not," but at this, some of my audience irreverently laughed. It is the old story of true lovers parted by an unsympathetic parent, the poor young man dies a premature death and on the spot where he dies, forget-me-nots spring up. This picture, prettily colored, as produced by Messrs. Pathe, is, perhaps, rather too idyllic for a general audience. Harlem seemed to be a little in doubt as to how to take it.

"The Ideas" is really a very nice moving picture theater situated in a charming part of New York City, and it is clearly so well conducted that it is deserving of every praise and commendation.

Notable Films of the Week.

Edison Co. "The Woodchopper's Child."

Among the films of the week there is one that stands out as a notable example of the efforts of the film manufacturer to provide stories of an elevating nature and at the same time of dramatic strength. At Keith's Bijou Dream, on Tuesday evening, no film received more applause, or was watched with closer interest, than "The Woodchopper's Child." Having read the synopsis, we were prepared for a different beginning, viz., one of intrigue, and we felt relieved and pleased that the producer had given a neater and cleaner turn to the sketch.

The overseer of a gang of woodchoppers discharges one who was caught stretched out on the ground, smoking his pipe, when he should have been at work. He sees a chance to steal the overseer's child and in dragging her to a hiding place in the woods he falls over a cliff and is supposed to fracture a limb. The child now becomes his nurse and later runs home and brings back her father, who carries home and attends the now contrite and forgiven woodsman. Clearly told throughout, the story leaves a profound impression. The execution is masterly and the action good all through, one of the best things from the Edison studio for some time. The little girl could not have done her part better, but there are two occasions when the man with the supposed fractured limb forgets his helplessness. The photographic quality of the film is excellent and the staging all that could be desired. It is to be hoped that the Edison Company will give us more films of the same class.

The Biograph "Lady Helen's Escapade."

In this charming film the Biograph people seem to us to have especially addressed themselves to our own particular dramatic preferences. For "Lady Helen's Escapade" is nothing more nor less than a delightfully refined comedy of manners, such as one is apt to associate with the work of Maxine Elliott, of New York, or Evelyn Millard, of London. As we watched the development of the story we wondered whether the author of the Biograph play had ever seen R. C. Carton's comedy, entitled "Lady Huntworth's Experiment." The two stories are very much alike; in both, the aristocratic woman becomes the menial, and she has some very amusing adventures before reverting to her old life and ways.

So we are justified in asking whether "Lady Helen's Escapade is an American comedy or an English comedy? If the former, why "Lady" Helen; if the latter, we are curious to know whether it is acceptable to the generality of American audiences. It certainly has our unstitnted admiration, and on the occasion when we saw it in public the other people seemed to like it very much. Indeed, they very highly applauded it.

From all this we draw the conclusion that refined comedy, as shown in moving pictures, will attract the attention and applause of moving picture audiences, who have got heartily tired of the sombre and the murderous. The story of the Biograph "Lady Helen" is very prettily and very clearly told in this comedy. The girl who was bored to death by ennui and seeks distraction by disguising herself and taking up a menial position in a strange house, is, as we have hinted, not a novel theme. But it is worked out by the Biograph players with unflinching decision and conviction. Indeed, the acting in this film is superb. Each character stands out individually and distinctively. During the few minutes the film is being run, one gets in touch, as it were, with the personalities of each of the people shown in this moving picture. Now we look upon this as a very great triumph for the Biograph Company, who, in the last few weeks, have by common consent placed themselves at the very head of American film manufacturers, alike for the technical and dramatic qualities of their pictures. This film is, indeed, what we have recently very emphatically asked for, a well-written, carefully rehearsed play, well produced and photographically good. Indeed, it seems, as it were, to come to us as an adequate answer to our request.

Of course, the chief honors of the picture are borne by the now famous Biograph girl, who must be gratified by the silent celebrity she has achieved. This lady combines with very great personal attractions very fine dramatic ability indeed. Some of the scenes of this film, if acted on the talking stage, would make the fortune of the play. The story of Lady Helen's Escapade has been told in detail in other parts of the World, and therefore need not be repeated here. Our object now is to single it out as dramatically and photographically the film of the week, and to indicate why, in our opinion, it deserves that distinction. We do not suggest that the Biograph Company can give us pictures in this vein every time. There must be variety, there must be, we presume, pointless jokes, like a "Sound Sleeper," but we do suggest that in cultivating the representation of finished comedy, and above all of the delineation of character in the moving picture, the Biograph Company can contribute much towards the "uplift" about which the self-constituted oracles of the daily press are talking and writing so much. There is one little scene in this film which was worth going miles to see. That is where Lady Helen delicately hints to the old musician that she is in love with him, and he, in return, is sceptical of his good fortune. Here we touch a very high level indeed, of the acting art; and so on right through this delightful film.

"Lady Helen's Escapade" is a very fine piece of photography and a very pretty story, and, we came away from looking at the picture rather envious of that musician. He was a lucky chap to win such a nice girl so easily. But he acted his part well and with artistic restraint. The scene in the kitchen, where Lady Helen, disguised as a domestic, has many encounters with the cookery utensils which she does not know how to use, and the viands she does not know how to cook, was full of delicate humor; and her attack on a too persistent suitor with for weapon the pie-crust she is making, provoked much laughter. Indeed, the various phases of the story linger in the memory, a rare thing for us to say of a moving picture, and we are so pleased with this exquisite production that we want all the patrons of moving picture theaters to participate in our enjoyment of it.

NOTES OF THE TRADE.

The Empire Film Exchange has moved uptown to an excellent location at the southwest corner of Fourteenth street and Third avenue.

The Brayton Mfg. Co., of Chicago, are specialists in artistic slides for all purposes. Mr. Bird, the manager, recently showed a representative of the World a very fine and original collection of announcement slides, recently issued by them. Attractive announcement slides are as indispensable in a well conducted picture show as a good film service or a Curtainyline finished screen.

The Crescent Amusement Company, 30 East Twenty-third street, New York, are buying second-hand films largely for the South American market. The prices paid are low as European competition, but the quality is not so important and it does not even matter if the titles are missing. Send list and specify condition and rock-bottom price to the Crescent Amusement Company and turn your dead stock into cash.

The Chicago Film Exchange will release on April 28 that most remarkable film, the "Italian Cavalry Ride," by Ambrosio. The complete copy is 2,173 feet long. This is the crack film that the Independents have justly boasted about and nothing like it has ever been produced or is likely to be seen again. "The Last Days of Pompeii" is another exceptionally fine film by the same maker that was issued last week by the Chicago Film Exchange. The "Summers-Britt Fight Pictures" controlled by the Chicago Film Exchange have been drawing the crowds wherever shown. This film was declared by an exhibitor to have more go in it than the much-heralded Burns-Johnson fight film, which is generally criticised by the newspapers as a fake.

The Premo Slide Company have opened a new main office at 934 Arch street, Philadelphia, where with better facilities they can assure a more prompt fulfillment of the increased orders for their slides. A. Anderson, the manager, showed us some of his latest productions. The slides were for "Nobody Knows Where John Brown Went," "Since Cohen Wrote That Mary Was a Grand Old Name," "Somewhere, Sometime, Someone." They are full of originality, sharp and clear and are indeed very fine specimens of what can be done to illustrate songs. His slides for "Come Down and Pick Your Husband Out" are a great hit in Philadelphia and have caused considerable merriment, as three well-known local moving picture exhibitors act the principal parts and they have done it well.

Beautiful slides have been made for the songs "Liza" and "Denver Town," published by Jerome Remick & Co., 131 West Forty-first street, New York. The slides are by a new concern, Casanovas Bros., and a little out of the ordinary. The songs are also good and will no doubt become very popular.

Comments on Film Subjects.

"A Traitor to His King."—A C. & M. film which represents two young men who profess to be lovers of their king. One is really a traitor, but in a brawl over a girl he succeeds in having the loyal one locked up. The girl, whose lover he is, follows him to jail, regales the jailor on drugged wine and gains entrance to the cell. The other appears at this juncture and is admitted to the cell for the purpose of taunting the one who has been arrested. With the girl's assistance he is bound and gagged, and covered with his coat the prisoner escapes. He secretes himself in a barn, and as he lies down he discovers papers in the coat which incriminate its owner. He hurries with them to the king and is rewarded with knighthood and the hand of the girl he loves. The other is publicly degraded and hurried away to execution. The film is excellent technically, and the staging is consistent throughout.

"The Magnetizer."—An Eclair comedy which shows a man who wants to get out, but his wife objects. He takes her to see an exhibition of hypnotism, and when they return home he tries it on her with such success that she goes to sleep and he escapes, to indulge in all sorts of high jinks. The servant discovers what ails her mistress and wakes her up. Her husband returns, after spending a night in a police station cell, and finds her still asleep. With a crony he starts to drink, but his wife unexpectedly awakes, and the two of them get all that is due them. It is funny, and the rough house at the close adds to the sport.

"Artful Art."—An Aquila comedy, in which a statue getting broken some cute artists seek to sell the owner another to take its place. They induce him to take a girl posed to represent a statue. The supposed statue is taken to his home, set up and he pays for it. The wife discovers that the statue is a fake and drives the girl out with a broom. She then takes the statue's place. When the man comes in he admires his new statue and gets too familiar, and is soundly belabored with a broom. The picture is very funny and keeps the audience in roars of laughter from the beginning to the end.

"Last Year's Time Table."—A Hepworth comedy in which a naval officer leaves his swetheart to go on a cruise, but misses his train because he used last year's time table. Meanwhile she, ignorant of this, falls asleep and dreams of his journey. One scene is in a Japanese tea room, and what occurs there makes her very jealous. He returns in time to arouse her, but the dream is so vivid that she thrusts him away, and it is only after an explanation that he makes her understand she has been dreaming and that he missed his train. Then she fells on his neck and weeps.

"Burglary in the Year 200."—A Raleigh & Roberts picture which introduces considerable magic. A professor invents something which, when scattered about, makes objects walk away. Two burglars see him experimenting, and after he has departed they steal the substance and use it in burglaries. They fall asleep because of too much wine and are captured by the police. The movement of different articles in the room makes the audience laugh heartily. These semi-magic films are always interesting.

"The Magic of Music."—A Gaumont film which purports to represent the all-powerful influence of music under certain conditions. A mother leaves her child asleep after she has been soothed by the father's violin. The little one gets her doll and, in doing it, upsets a candle, which sets fire to the bed. The fright causes the mother to lose her reason. After trying to restore it, the father suggests a repetition of the scene when the child was lulled to sleep. The experiment is tried and the mother's reason returns. It is a rather strange story, but ends happily, hence it cannot be severely criticised.

"The Game of Pallone."—An Itala film which represents the troubles that arise through a gentleman becoming infatuated with the game of pallone. He smashes everything that comes in his way, and a constantly increasing crowd of those who have suffered from his enthusiasm follow him until he eludes them and gets safely behind a barred door. The action, staging and photography of this film are alike good, and many hearty laughs are heard.

"High Game."—A comedy from Cricks & Martin which has a good deal of merit. A couple receive a goose from an uncle, but it is so high they give it away. The recipient passes it on, and it goes from hand to hand until a tramp gets it, and he throws it on the dump. A message follows it from the uncle in which he states that as it is his nephew's birthday he has stuffed the goose with 10-pound notes. Then begins a frantic chase, and just as the dump is reached, with everyone who has handled it aiding in the search, a dog carries it away. This gives an opportunity to introduce a very lively chase, with the dog always just a bit in the lead. Finally the goose is taken away from the dog and a telegram arrives from the uncle saying that he forgot to put the notes in the goose and is sending a check instead. The chief faults of this picture are in the photography. The characters are too close to the camera and walk toward it, blurring the picture badly in spots.

"Coster Sold the Seeds."—A Warwick film representing a coster as trying to sell seeds. Finally one gentleman buys and scatters the seed beside his fence. During the night the coster returns and plants bushes where the seeds were sown, appearing again with more seeds just as the neighborhood is admiring the marvelous growth. The coster has no difficulty in selling what seeds he has and goes away laughing heartily over his good for tune and the results of his trick.

"A War Time Tale."—A Pathe film in which some of the unpleasant consequences of war are graphically illustrated. A man learns of an invasion of his country and leaves his wife and family to enlist. While on sentry duty he receives a message from his wife saying that their child is ill and asking him to return to her so she will not have to bear the trouble alone. He drops his gun and goes immediately. The officers in making their rounds discover that he has left his post and order out a detachment to arrest him for desertion. They find him at home comforting his sorrowing wife, but tear him from her side and hurry him away to execution. Just as the squad is about to fire, his wife, carrying the sick child, rushes in front of the rifles. The officer strikes the muzzles upward and listens to her story. He then draws his sword, but here the film ends, leaving the picture unfinished. Much can be imagined, but no one really knows whether the man is executed or not. The technical quality of the film is up to the Pathe standard, but the ending is unpardonable. Are we to understand that it is the work of the censor? Worse still, the manufacturer should have supplied a suitable ending.

"Jack's Successful Bluff."—A Pathe comedy in which a man has trouble with his wife because he came home the worse for imbibing too freely and is kicked out of the house. He writes a message on the wall that he is going to commit suicide. She discovers the message and rushes off to the police station to tell her story. While telling it an officer enters with her husband's clothes and the lady faints. Meanwhile the man has gone to the water's edge, taken off his clothes, laid them down and has sneaked home and hidden in an inside room. His wife comes in weeping over his clothes and he appears from the inner room. Then they make up and she promises all sorts of obedience now that she has him back. The film is funny and the laughs are continuous from beginning to end. Whether the type of fun is to be commended or not is a question which the audience should determine for themselves.

"Student Days."—A Vitagraph film which has a good many laughs in its length. Two students steal a dancing bear and the difficulties they and the bear get into are funny enough to make the saddest person laugh. The bear gets into a house and interrupts a minister's call upon one of his parishoners. And the rumpus which follows his exploits until he is taken in charge by his master is sufficient to make sport for a time. The action is well maintained throughout. In places the photography is weak, but perhaps some prints show better than the one the writer saw.

"A Plot Foiled."—An Eclipse film in which a plot to rob a man is foiled by a child. There is some binding and gagging and some shooting, but the photography is so clear and the action is so good that it is well worth while. The scenario and the excellent pictorial work throughout are worth reproduction.

"A Bachelor's Persistence."—An Eclipse comedy in which the persistence of a bachelor at last wins him the object of his affections. It is filled with rebuffs and quick turns and some amusing situations develop. The scenery is excellent. There is one scene where the sea is dashing over the rocks which is exceptionally good pictorially and photographically.

"Forgiven, or Father and Son."—A Vitagraph subject which represents a father and son coming almost to blows over a girl to whom the young man is paying attention and the father turns him outdoors. The young man goes to see the girl and she turns him out, confirming what the father said that she was only amusing herself. The young man starts back home, but decides to enlist for the Philippines. He is killed in a battle and the father is apprised of his death through the papers. Later he is asked to go to a motion picture show in which the last battle the young man was in is depicted and the father sees him write out his forgiveness just before he falls. The action and staging are both good and the reproduction of a motion picture in a motion picture is so good that it seems like the original.

"The Orange Grower's Daughter."—A Kalem film which tells a story of love and jealousy in a lively and interesting way. The film is exceptionally good, perhaps better than the Kalem pictures which have gone before.

"In the Days of Witchcraft."—An elaborate film from the Edison studio which no doubt faithfully illustrates the days when witchcraft with its attendant cruelties virtually ruled certain portions of New England. While this picture is excellent, the only fault being the harsh lighting in places, it is more interesting for what it suggests than for what it really shows. It is hard to think that such scenes as this were almost daily enacted in Massachusetts not so very long ago and to have it brought before one so vividly is interesting. The picture has historic value as well.

"A Troublesome Satchel."—A Biograph comedy in which a gentleman buys a satchel at an express package sale. Upon opening it he discovers that it contains burglars' tool. His attempts to get rid of it are very amusing. Every time he leaves it someone appears to tell him that he has left his satchel behind. And he dare not leave it because of the articles it contains. After a time he is held up by two highwaymen, who, when they open the satchel, assume that he is one of them and return all his property. He leaves the satchel on a pile of stone and gets away without difficulty. It is a good bit of comedy and has the rare fault that it is too short.

"The Wood Chopper's Child."—One of the best films that has come from the Edison studio in a long time. The scenes laid in the woods are especially good. The photography is clear and the rocks and crags are good reproductions. The only criticism is that the little girl goes about bareheaded and barehanded while the men wear thick skin coats. There is no snow, but the leaves are gone from the trees, indicating that it is Fall and that it must be cold enough for a child to require some covering for her hands and head. Aside from this there is little to find fault with. The picture is good from the opening scene to the close.

"Outcast and Heroine."—A Vitagraph subject evidently based upon some story of early days. The costumes indicate that it was something more than a century ago and the introduction of an Indian attack also fixes the date. A girl whose parentage is doubtful is looked upon as a child of sin and is treated accordingly. A young soldier rides up to the house where she stays and is much struck with her appearance. A spy listens to their conversation and hears that they are to meet that evening. He tells of the arrangement and a posse go to the trysting place, where they wait until after the meeting and arrest her. She is publicly denounced for unmaidenly conduct and sentenced to four hours in the public pillory. Before the sentence can be executed the Indians attack the place and she volunteers to ride for aid. She goes direct to the garrison where her soldier lover is and a troop is sent to the aid of the menaced settlers. They arrive just in time. The Indians are driven away and the girl is proclaimed a heroine. Those who denounced her are readiest to praise and ask her forgiveness. The film closes with her in her lover's arms. This is an excellent picture, but it looks rather strange to see the solid stone walls of a church wave in the breeze. And that is exactly what the painted scenery did when this picture was made. Photography, action and scenario are good, with this single exception.

"The Poet's Vision."—A Gaumont which shows a poet walking through some ruins. A fairy appears and whispers something to him. Then as he passes he sees everything with changed eyes. A couple of fakirs fighting appear as Roman soldiers. Two commonplace tourists wandering among the ruins appear as a Roman gentleman and his mistress. The caretaker is a Roman centurion. And not until these visions have all been passed and enjoyed does the fairy return and remove the scales from his eyes. The interest in the picture is centered in the beautiful photography and the pictorial quality of the picture itself. It is unusually good, even for a Gaumont.

THE LECTURES.

A change of lecturers at one of the principal houses made a vast difference in the presentation of the subjects and served to add interest to the lectures given. The lectures were quite up to the standard, and in the case of "Mexico" at Proctor's Twenty-third street house the lecture and the illustrations were both better than they have been.

All the other lectures have been quite up to the standard. In fact, it would seem as though the quality is gradually improving. The slides are better and in most instances the lectures themselves are better. Where the quality and presentation of the lecture are satisfactory it adds to the program, and in all the best houses this holds good now.

THE SONGS.

Only two or three new songs have been heard this week. The rest were all old ones, but in this instance the fact that they were old did not detract from their attractiveness as parts of the excellent programs offered. The new ones were illustrated by DeWitt C. Wheeler and A. L. Simpson, and it is needless to say that the slides were exceptionally good, not only technically, but as interpretations of the sentiment of the song.

The singers appear to be doing better, therefore all the component parts of the song have appealed strongly to the audience. In at least one instance Mr. Wheeler's excellent slides have made the song.

JIMMY BRITT

Buffalo, N. Y.—The Academy Theater, which for some time has been running melodramas, gave way to moving pictures and vaudeville and will continue so for the Summer season.

Washington C. H., Ohio.—R. H. Colman general manager of the Palace Amusement Company, has purchased the Palace Theater, and his policy is to exhibit only first-class moving pictures.

St. Louis, Mo.—The Mecca Amusement Company has taken over a ten-year lease on the building at the corner of Finney and Grand avenues, where they will remodel the place to be the home of a moving picture show.

Iowa Falls, Iowa.—Mr. Hopkins is to operate a moving picture theater in this city, which will be known as the "Electric." He has been remodeling the Kennedy for some time past, and expects to have his playhouse in operation within a short time.

Norfolk, N. Y.—Hull & Pressey, proprietors of the Picture Parlor, Norwood, N. Y., have just installed a new Motiograph which is not only pleasing them but is also pleasing their patrons very highly. Mr. Pressey says that it has indeed proved itself to be "the machine without a flicker."

St. Louis, Mo.—A new corporation known as the Consolidated Construction and Amusement Company, has been formed with a capital stock of $250,000, for the purpose of erecting a chain of houses throughout the State. Those interested in the incorporation are Wm. H. Miltenberger, V. W. Garesche, and S. Breadon.

Chambersburg, Pa.—A new theater is being built here for H. R. Weber, the proprietor and manager of the Palace. The new place will seat about four hundred and be ready about June 1. It is to be of fireproof construction and equipped with the latest and most approved apparatus and fixtures. The entrance is on the main street, with exits leading into side streets. Under Mr. Weber's management it will no doubt be a success.

Everett, Wash.—A. M. Miller has bought the Dreamland, on Wetmore avenue. He takes possession April 20. C. Schultz, the former lessee of both this and the Grand Theater on Hewitt avenue, will open a new house in Bellingham, Wash.

The Grand, J. L. Frazier, manager, is one of the most up-to-date straight moving picture houses on the Coast, playing to S. R. O. every night. It has as competitors three other houses which are running vaudeville and pictures, but owing to the superiority of the pictures shown by the Grand it does not suffer from the competition. Managers of some of the shows in the far West do some things better than in the East. We could name several most successful shows on the Pacific Coast whose success is due to the fact that they have not spared expense where the money is more wisely invested than in gaudy exteriors. They put it in the show and the public are quick to pick out and stick to the best. An exhibitor from Portland, who visited the World office, gives the same tip that is given by the success of the Grand in Everett. Get the best operator you can find and then give him everything to work with of the best, even to a good salary. Then conduct your house as it should be and watch the bank account grow.

Ground is being broken in Everett for another strictly modern theater with a seating capacity of 1,180, to run vaudeville and pictures. The cost will be $85,000.

EXHIBITOR PRAISES INDEPENDENT QUALITY.

Cincinnati, Ohio, April 14, 1909.

Editor The Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—I read in your issue of the 10th, under heading of "Brothers, Where Are We Drifting To?" signed by An Exhibitor.

I note what the exhibitor says regarding the Motion Picture Patents Company and the Independents. I think he is laboring under the wrong impression and does not know the moving picture business at all, as who would be so ignorant as to state that the Independents are not turning out good feature films? I am located in the city of Cincinnati with keen competition all around me and am securing Independent films. Wish to say that my business has doubled since I started with an Independent exchange in this city.

The Patents Company claims to give us protection, stating they would not issue a license to any one starting in the same square if it would hurt the present exhibitor who was licensed. But they have violated their statements, as there have been started three moving picture theaters in this town since the formation of the M. P. P. Co., which hurt my business, and I was compelled to take an Independent service in order to secure films that my competitors were not using.

The M. P. P. Co. has licensed nine manufacturers, and out of these nine there are only five of them that turn out pictures of any merit, and sometimes the pictures turned out by these five manufacturers are such that they cannot be run, for the fact that they are full of murder, etc. I am changing daily and am securing some of the best films I have ever seen in my experience in the show business, and

LICENSED FIRMS NOT ABOVE USING JUNK SERVICE.

Indianapolis, Ind., April 15, 1909.

Editor The Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—In your issue of April 10 editorially you speak of UNTITLED JUNK, and plenty of it, as comprising the programme.

I wish to say right here that there are more houses of this class, OWNED and OPERATED by one of the leading members of the Motion Picture Patents Company, and who have openly said: "That there is where the money is to be made," "Public be damned," concerning the houses he owns and controls, but when it comes to the renter whom HE or THEY sell to, then that is another question. You should ask for and get the latest, particularly of their goods!

Now the fact still remains that nickelodeons are and have always been the support of these manufacturers. Then why are they or he allowed to enter into the exhibitor's ranks, and by giving this class of an entertainment in a large, luxurious house a whole afternoon or evening for five cents, ruin the chance of a small competing house when this house can only seat from 150 to 200 patrons, and who must necessarily have many full houses and short shows for five cents to even make expenses?

Many of the rental exchanges are doing this same thing, and in places where other exhibitors are almost compelled to rent their goods from their competitor, or the large house and exchange.

There are many injustices in this business, but I believe this practice is one of the worst, and one that I know to a certainty is to be the death of many small, and, in the past, profitable exhibitors.

Cannot the Patents Company compel all manufacturers and renters to quit the field as exhibitors?

Yours very truly,

INDIANAPOLIS CALCIUM LIGHT AND FILM EXCHANGE COMPANY.

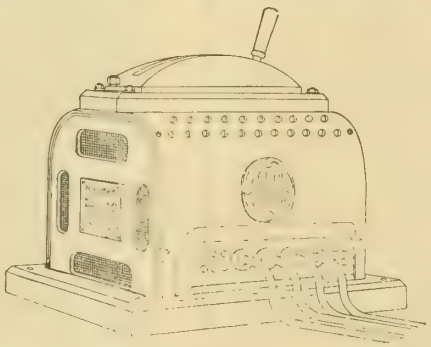
TRANSFORMER

For Moving Picture Machines

(Alternating Current)

SIMPLE COMPACT EFFICIENT

THIS TRANSFORMER, KNOWN AS "THE G. E. ECONOMY-ARC" mustof necessity be an invaluable adjunct to any alternating current moving picture installation. THE ADVANTAGES OF A TRANSFORMER FOR THIS WORK WILL BE APPRECIATED by both the theatre management and operator; BY THE MANAGEMENT in the reduction of light bills and in the better production of the pictures due to the steady light obtained, AND BY THE OPERATOR in the simplicity of the device, the absence of danger from shocks,, and the added comfort in the lamp house due to the low heating.



Price, $75.00

THE SAVING IN POWER INSURED BY THE USE OF A TRANSFORMER INSTEAD OF A RHEOSTAT VARIES FROM 65 to 90 per cent., depending upon the voltage from the supply mains. Many lighting companies require the use of 220 volts for moving picture work in order to avoid heavily loading one side of a three wire system This increases the loss considerably in circuits using a resistance or reactive device for reducing the voltage.

Stories of the Films.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

'TIS AN ILL WIND THAT BLOWS NO GOOD.—Tim Noonan and Mary Flinn were sweethearts and both were employed at the paper box factory. Jack Dunn rudely jostles against Mary, which arouses the ire of Tim, who lays Jack out with a powerful blow, for Tim is somewhat of a pugilist. The confusion brings the boss, a bantam, on the scene, who scolds—yes, actually scolds Tim, and Tim picks the boss up bodily, spanks him and quits. For some time he wanders about looking for work, but without success, until he is finally evicted from his boarding house. Discouraged and hungry he passes a restaurant. The sight of the viands in the window emphasizes his already famished condition, so he enters and begs for a bite to eat. The proprietor coldly waves him away with a refusal, and in abject desperation he seizes a piece of pie and runs, overturning everybody who attempts to hinder him. Out of the place he rushes followed by a mob. A policeman joins the pursuers and Tim finding them gaining on him rushes into a vacant house and ascends the stairs. In dashes the copper with such force that he stumbles and drops his gun. Tim seizes this and compels the guardian of the peace to divest himself of his cap and coat, which he puts on. Locking the policeman in the room, he rushes past the mob at the door, who think him the cop. He makes them believe the thief has escaped by the window and sends them one way while he goes the other. Free, he hides in one of the side streets to get his breath. While there an Italian woman rushes up and calls for help, as her husband is at home drunk and threatening to kill them all. Here is trouble. He tries to back out, but the woman insists he being a cop it is his duty to protect her. He goes and with one punch lays the wild Italian out stiff. He then drags him to the station house and receives the praise of the chief for bagging a dangerous and much sought for criminal. He tries to sneak, when in comes the real policeman, who denounces him. The chief, at first enraged, but later, considering his daring deed, appoints him on the force as a full-fledged copper. His star is now in its ascendency, so he visits the factory, calls for Mary and proposes marriage, which she coyly accepts. Length, 876 feet.

LUCKY JIM.—Jim and Jack were desperately in love with Gertrude, but Gertie showed a decided preference for Jim, so Jim wins out and marries Gertie—lucky Jim! Poor Jack is a miserable spectator at the wedding. Jim and his bride have ensconced in their little flat, and are enjoying their first meal. Sad to say, Gertie's education in the art of cooking has been woefully neglected and the result of her first attempt is simply awful. It is so bad that Jim kicks, and in return for his vehement vituperation he receives the little delicate attentions that Xanthippe bestowed upon Socrates—numerous articles of tableware at his head—sweet-tempered Gertie—lucky Jim. Meanwhile unlucky Jack is at home repining before a portrait of Gertie. Time goes on and poor Jack is still repining, when a notice in the newspaper is shown him which chronicles the intelligence that Jim has shuffled, a victim of acute indigestion, and his head is now adorned with a halo instead of the rim of a dish-pan. Jack feels that here is his chance, and Gertie is more interesting than before from the fact of being a widow, so he makes his appeal and is accepted. Jack is in the seventh heaven of delight when he returns with the sweet angel Gertie from the obsequ——, no I mean the marriage ceremony. But wait; that first meal is to transpire. Well, it comes in due time, and Jack gets a chance to sample a bit of Gertrude's cooking, and if the road to the heart is through the stomach in Jack's case the roadbed is pretty rocky. He positively refuses to drink her coffee, and, of course, his repellency meets with the same reward meted Jim, to wit: china tableware bounced from his cerebrum shell. Gertie, having demonstrated her ability as a discobolus thrower, leaves the room in a rage. Jack turns and seeing the mourning-draped picture of his predecessor, sighs, "Oh, lucky Jim, how I envy him."

TWIN BROTHERS.—Two boys, twins, leave the old homestead to seek their fortune in the world. They go divergent roads, and are soon widely separated one from the other, but they grow lonesome and try to find each other's whereabouts, without success. We lose sight of Bill and Dick is seen up against it good and hard. For him the future looks like a chalk ring on a blackboard, until he happens to saunter along the Bowery, where the manager of a dime museum offers him a job to play the gorilla. It looks good so he accepts. It is pretty sort until the astute impressario decides to pull off an innovation; that is, a gorilla and lion in the same cage. Of course Dick objects most strenuously to this arrangement, but his objections are quailed with a treacherous looking gun, so he is forced to share the same menagerie ballroom with the lion. Now the lion is as frightened at the gorilla as the gorilla is at the lion, for they are both fakes. On discovering each other's harmlessness they both decide to mutiny, and upon throwing aside their disguise they—no, yes, it is—Dick—Bill—and they are in each other's arms.

THE LITTLE SHEPHERD OF "TUMBLING RUN."—"On airy downs the idling shepherd lies, and sees to-morrow in the marbled skies." Thus lived the little shepherd of whom our picture tells—"far from the madd'ning crowd's ignoble strife."

But even in the simple life of a shepherd, tragedy may creep. After an uneventful day spent amid hills and dales of the beautiful country, our little friend returns home with his flock, to find that one lamb is missing.

The head shepherd, a warthful man, accuses the boy of having stolen the lamb. The boy tearfully protests his innocence. His mother tries to console him but without avail.

During the night the boy, unable to sleep, arises and with lantern in hand goes forth to find the missing member of his flock.

In the dawn of early day he finds the lamb safe and unhurt. But the little fellow's misfortunes are not over—for in trying to reach the lambkin he falls from the rocks and lies helpless.

Calling his faithful dog he ties his scarf to his collar and bids him go home in hopes that his mother may understand and bring help. The dog does his bidding and our little hero awaits the outcome with fortitude.

The dog reaches home, and the anxious mother, calling the shepherds, immediately starts to the rescue—led by the intelligent animal. They find the boy and carry him home.

The head shepherd, learning of the boy's actions—full of remorse begs forgiveness and insists that the lad keep the lamb for himself—but our little hero completes his work by having his mother take the lamb to its mother—once it is safe in the fold the boy is content. App. length, 930 feet.

UNCLE TOM WINS.—A persistent wooer of the Goddess Fortune, Uncle Tom is at last rewarded. She smiles and showers him with her favor.

Uncle Tom receives a telegram announcing that his lottery ticket wins the capital prize. Jealously guarding his secret he awaits in trembling expectancy the arrival of the money.

Although treated harshly he smiles at the thought of his future independence. When the expressman arrives Uncle Tom is alone—jubilantly he gloats over his newly acquired wealth—oblivious to surroundings the entrance of husband and son is not heard—too late for concealment he meets their covetous gaze.

From a "Thing of Joy" his money becomes a source of constant worry—hiding it in a trunk the boy sees him—changing the place of hiding to the old carpet-bag he is spied on by the husband.

At this juncture Mirandy entering discovers the "Peeping Toms" and hustles them both out to the woodpile.

Uncle Tom, still dissatisfied, carries the money to the garret, and hides it in an old chair—the boy, thinking the money in the trunk, carries it up into the garret and forces it open, only to find that he had his "Trouble for his pains"—someone coming he hides in the trunk—the husband slyly enters with the carpet-bag—breaking it open his disappointment knows no bounds—hearing footsteps, he hides behind an old sofa—entering, Uncle Tom, still worried over the safety of his fortune, removes it from the old chair and leaves, oblivious to the amazement and chagrin of the arch conspirators. Length, 600 feet.

AN UNSUCCESSFUL SUBSTITUTION.—The disordered room tells the story of the night's dissipation. Waking, Mr. Jags experiences the mental and physical suffering of the transgressor. A thousand trip hammers pounding—in erratic dissonance—seem to be working in his brain.

In mental anguish he rings the bell that summons the butler. This dignitary, although unsympathetic, responds promptly with "First aid"—a wet towel bound round the aching head is followed by a glass of "Eye opener" placed in the trembling fingers; partial relief is at hand.

Unfortunately, Mrs. Jags enters; a glance discloses the situation. The "Eye opener" with the tray and bottles are seized and thrown out the window—her anger is unreasoning—she berates husband and butler—threatening disciplinary measures. The raging wife leaves the room. Meanwhile a painter outside, who was struck by the flying bottles, mounts the ladder and becomes an interested spectator of the household's internal strife. In commiseration he offers a can of alcohol to the suffering man through the window. Drinking it, Mr. Jags doubles up in agony and calls loudly for help. The butler, fearful of Mrs. Jags' anger, refuses to obtain stimulants.

The unhappy man decides to seek relief outside. Dressed for the street he is held up by his wife, who confiscates his clothing and puts him back to bed.

Something must be done—he appeals to the painter who suggests escape by way of the ladder. The butler is called and compelled to take Mr. Jags' place in the bed. Mr. Jags, attired in the butler's clothing, clambers down the ladder.

Directly Mrs. Jags enters and "plants herself" to keep watch over her supposed prisoner. The unfortunate butler in trying to escape, is captured by the enraged wife and suffers the results of a beating for the deceit of her convivial husband. Length, 300 feet.

OLD HEIDELBERG.—A story of German student life. The Crown Prince of "Saxon Coleburg," nephew to the King and heir apparent to the throne, has been reared in the strict and rigid formality of a German court. About the age of sixteen it is decided to prepare him for Heidelberg. A new instructor is secured—an old German professor named Dr. Jutner. He is very democratic in manner and enters the somber Palace of Saxon Coleburg like the first breath of Spring. The young Prince, weary of the coldness and monotony of court life, becomes deeply attached to the old professor. The Prime Minister, wishing to counteract this feeling, notifies the Kink that Dr. Jutner is too lenient and too democratic to mold the character of a Crown Prince. In consequence of this, he is about to be dismissed when the young Prince so earnestly pleads for him that the King decides to send them both to the University of Heidelberg. The Prince is a student and the Doctor, of course, is his tutor. Now it happens that the Doctor is a graduate of Heidelberg, and on the journey he tells the Prince that there are no court frills or rank at Heidelberg—that all are equal. This knowledge does not displease the Prince, and at the University he acts like a sensible young man, engaging and simple in his manner. While there he meets Katie (a waitress at a favorite inn near the University) and falls in love with her. Life to him now is joyous and free. He forgets the rigid discipline of the Castle of Saxon Coleburg in the friendship of his fellow students, and the love of Katie. All is happiness, when a messenger arrives—the Prime Minister—bringing news of the King's death, and informing the Crown Prince that he must leave Heidelberg immediately, as he is now King of Saxon Coleburg. The young King at first refuses, saying he is happy at Heidelberg, that he does not want the throne, but the Prime Minister sternly shows him his duty as a King. The young Prince, heartbroken, leaves Katie and the University, returns to Saxon Coleburg and ascends the throne, but he cannot forget Katie or Heidelberg, and suddenly one day he returns to Heidelberg on a visit, but he is now King and no longer a student. Things are not as they were. The students remember only that he is a King, and the story closes with the pathetic parting of the Prince and Katie. Length, 1,000 feet.

THE ARTIST AND THE GIRL.—A beautiful pastoral drama of romantic love, parental opposition, elopement and final reconciliation woven around four principal characters: James Stuart, a stern old Presbyterian, war veteran in poor circumstances, living on a small plantation near the St. John's River; Ruth Stuart, his daughter, a simple country girl of 18; Richard Morton, a young artist from New York, who is spending the winter in Florida on the advice of his physician, and Henry Bond, a neighbor of the Stuarts, a rough man of middle age, but well supplied with this world's goods. All the scenes are laid in the beautiful tropical scenery of the Southland. Complete lecture from Kalem Company.

THE AUTOMATIC MONKEY.—In this picture we find Jocko, a full size automatic monkey, taking a hand at the fine arts. He demonstrates his ability with the brush and palette—wins laurels as a sculptor, tries architecture and proves an apt scholar of music. Length, 324 feet.

HOW THEY PROPOSE.—Theory and practice have always been somewhat at variance and in this series of views the practice of proposing is illustrated from the view point of the novelist and of the everyday practitioner.

The author of the novel has a peculiar sentimental manner of the hero meeting the heroine, etc., the kitchen maid has a rule of action in vogue in her sphere, the traveler in the coach follows precedents long established and the god of the gallery gives way to the manner of his type. Length, 292 feet.

BEFORE AND AFTER.—Illustrates the charming manners of a modest young lady in her quest for a husband.

She is attentive, solicitous and loving so that the young fellow falls an easy victim to her plan of action. Six months after the wedding ceremony matters look a trifle different at the home of the young couple.

AN UNWRITTEN LETTER.—A blind grandmother is escorted to church by her nephew. As the two leave the church edifice to return to their home they meet a number of young men friends of the nephew. When later the young man is out in public his friends ridicule him for having escorted a blind woman to church. He pretends to ignore their taunts, but when they persist with their annoyance he slaps one of them in the face. For this he is challenged to a duel.

Returning to his home he imparts the facts to his father. The grandmother is to know nothing of the affair and as explanation to her a journey is arranged and all accompany the noble young fellow to the station. The journey, however, is not one on business as alleged, but to the field of honor. The seconds return after the duel and report to the father the death of his son.

Almost heartbroken the parents share with each other their grief, but cannot apprise the grandmother of their loss and sorrow. Daily she waits for news of her nephew, who has always proven a devoted companion to her, and she cannot explain why he does not write.

The parents finally determine to deceive her and accordingly they insert a blank sheet of paper in an envelope properly addressed, which is delivered by the mail carrier. They eagerly tear it open and with great difficulty the mother pretends to read from the blank pages an account of his experiences and endearing words of solicitation for her welfare.

One day as another message is received and she is seated alone in the garden she calls to the gardener, whom she hears close by, to come to her to read the letter.

The gardener, not knowing of the deception, discloses to her that the pages she holds are blank. When soon after the daughter reappears and learns of the incident she tearfully relates the truth to her aged parent and together they share the sorrow of their grief and irreparable loss. Length, 1,060 feet.

TWO LADIES AND A BEGGAR.—Anxious to avoid working for a living a vagrant contrives an appliance by means of which he appears to be deprived of his limbs and obliged to wheel himself about in a little cart, and seeks public charity. Two good old ladies take pity upon the fellow and after investigating decide to give the poor unfortunate all possible aid. Accordingly they cut down his trousers to what they deem more suitable length, secure specially appointed rooms with furniture of size and style adaptable to a man afflicted as he purports to be and even endeavor to secure him a wife from among other unfortunates of his type. All is graciously received by the imposter until the wife is tendered when he exposes himself and flees. Length, 690 feet.

DREAM SPECTRES.—Illustrating the visions of an aged man in the Orient. Having surreptitiously indulged in a few whiffs from a pipe the old man sinks into oblivion and then experiences some very vivid and exciting dreams. Length, 292 feet.

PATHE FRERES

THE GOLD PROSPECTORS.—In the first scene we see the prospectors in their camp, and then watch them as they start out for the mines, where they toil all day in search of the precious metal. In the evening they return to the camp and divide the day's finding. They sleep out in the open with but one man acting as sentinel, keeping watch over the outfit, and ready to spread the alarm in the event of an attack by the Indians. The savages who are constantly on the lookout for an opportunity to attack the white men, survey the country from their hiding place in the mountains, where from the tall peaks they are able to see everything that goes on in the camp below. In the calm of night they quietly steal down on the prospectors, taking the sentinel unawares, put him to death. They then gather up everything of value and hasten away to their hiding place in the mountains. Some scouts on the outpost follow the red men and on discovering their hiding place, return to the camp and give the alarm. Immediately the prospectors are up in arms and start on the trail of the enemy. The white men after a long chase come upon the Indian camp, and as the savages come dashing up the prospectors, who are lying in ambush, use their skill as marksmen to good advantage and fill the red men with bullets. The chief, who is the last one to pass by, is killed by the little son of the dead sentinel. Length, 557 feet.

THE CLEVER REPORTER.—A young reporter receives instructions from the editor of his papet to interview a young lady who has recently returned from an expedition into the wilds of Africa. The pompous youth thinks he has a very easy task before him and at first it looks as if he were correct in his supposition, for he is received very graciously by the lady in question when he calls at the hotel. She becomes very much vexed, however, and positively refuses to be interviewed when she learns the object of his visit. Finally, the reporter becomes so persistent that the lady in her fury has him thrown out of the place without further ceremony. Realizing now that the task is a little more difficult than he anticipated, he decides to resort to strategy—for he is determined that he will get the interview, no matter at what cost. At first he disguises as a waiter and secures employment in the hotel, and as he serves the lady her meals he tries to get her into conversation; but it is not long before she recognizes the persistent youth, and so he is again kicked out into the street. After many more attempts, each one unsuccessful, the reporter secures an invitation to a reception given in honor of the young woman explorer. He puts on a clever disguise and appears at the function and is soon seen in friendly conversation with his victim; their friendship seems to wax as the moments pass, until finally it is a case of mutual true love, and the youth, losing his head, declares himself in glowing terms, and the beautiful young woman gladly accepts him. Immediately a clergyman is summoned and the couple are married, after which the reporter throws off his disguise, revealing his identity to his wife, and the latter taking it all as a huge joke, gladly consents to tell him all she knows. Length, 361 feet.

THE FAIRY'S PRESENTS.—Tells an interesting little fairy story in which we see a helpless maiden, whose brothers have turned her out of the home after her father's death. She strolls through the wood footsore and tired, searching for some place to rest her weary head, when suddenly and old woman, sadly in need of a helping hand, appears before her. The girl assists the forlorn old creature and immediately the latter turns into a beautiful Fairy Queen. She gives the astonished girl a wand and tells her to return home again, but the brothers are unwilling to let her in, so we see her wandering along in a most dejected manner. While passing a well the Fairy Queen again appears to her and this time gives her a horn out of which she blows a lot of gold. The maiden gathers up the money and returns to the old home again, but the cruel brothers take it all away, and as they are about to turn her out, the good Fairy appears and with a touch of her wand transforms them into swine. With another wave of her wand she causes a dashing youth to appear on the scene and is presented to the happy maiden as her future husband. Length, 328 feet.

LOVE-SICK BARBER.—A very susceptible youth who is employed as a barber is desperately in love with a pretty manicurist in the same establishment. His impulses often get the best of his good judgment, and consequently he soon becomes such a nuisance that the young woman is compelled to seek aid from the proprietor, who rebukes the youth severely for his unbecoming conduct. The latter is so madly in love, however, he forgets his duties, and in shaving a fellow, he pays so little attention to what he is about that he gives the unfortunate customer a deep gash with the razor. The enraged proprietor by this time has lost patience and kicks the lovesick fellow out of the place. Determined to be near the idol of his heart, the youth goes to his room, and after putting on a disguise returns to the barber shop and takes a seat in the chair to have his long hair cut. The proprietor of the place is on the job, and realizing that the customer is wearing a wig, pulls it off and there to his horror is the lovesick barber. The latter would have received little mercy at the hands of the indignant tonsorial artist had not the girl interceded for him; for touched by his devotion to her, which has been the cause of all his troubles, she relents and promises to marry him, whereupon they receive the congratulations of the amused proprietor. Length, 292 feet.

THE SUSPICIOUS FENCING-MASTER.—A young man makes the acquaintance of a very pretty girl who lives just opposite and the latter invites him to call. The youth goes over to pay a visit and is presented to the maiden's mother, who receives him very effusively. The young man is desperately in love with the girl, but he has the trying task before him of securing her stern old father's consent to their marriage. The latter, who is a fencing master, soon puts in his appearance, and the ladies, very much excited by his sudden entrance, endeavor to hide their guest; but the old fellow soon discovers the youth and drags him from his cramped quarters. Suspecting that some underhand work is going on the father questions the youth closely, but finally the latter confesses that he wishes to marry the girl. Being a crank on the subject of physical development, the old fellow immediately puts the young man through a series of calisthenic exercises to find out whether or not he is fit physically to be be his son-in-law. After convincing himself that he is in good shape, and feeling satisfied that he is worthy in every respect the old man gives his consent to the marriage and thereby makes all hands happy. Length, 328 feet.

WILBUR WRIGHT'S AEROPLANE.—In the first picture we see Mr. Wilbur Wright giving some of his wonderful exhibitions in Paris, and we get a good view at close range of the aeroplane as it is prepared for flight. Mr. Wright operates it himself, and we see him as he flies along the surface of the earth like a bird, and then rising to a height of 160 feet, where he passed under a line of balloons and wins the prize offered by the Aero Club de la Sarthe, Paris. Next we see him winning the Michelin cup for remaining in the air for two hours. Finally, there is an excellent view given of Mr. Wright and his aeroplane flying at a height of 700 feet and remaining at that tremendous altitude for two hours; a feat never before accomplished. Length, 800 feet.

PLAYING PATIENCE.—This trick film in colors shows a girl enter upon the scene bearing a large box of puzzle blocks. She bows and smiles to the audience and then begins the game of patience. She piles the blocks up, forming a square, on the surface of which appears all sorts of pretty faces and grotesque characters which come and go at her bidding. A large frame is then carried in, upon which the blocks are piled, and the transformation scenes that meet our gaze are indescribable in their beauty and cleverness, showing as they do all sorts of objects performing on the blocks. Length, 230 feet.

THE BOHEMIAN GIRL.—The first scene of this colored film opens in a Gypsy camp, where a pretty young girl is seated on the grass reading the cards, while her parents are engaged in the task of making baskets. Soon a prosperous looking man appears and seems much interested in the picturesque scene before him. He stops to talk to the pretty girl, who is reading the cards, and as he turns to go she follows and begs him to let her tell his fortune. The man consents and waits to hear what the maiden has to tell him of coming events, as she spreads the cards on the ground and reads what the future holds in store for him. Becoming very much interested in the maiden, the man, before taking his departure, hands her his card and invites her to visit his home whenever she wishes to do so. The happy girl returns to the camp, where she meets her father, and as she recounts to him the stranger's kindness the hot-headed man flies into a rage and in his anger strikes the girl. The latter, on the impulse of the moment decides to run away and seek help from the kind stranger, to whose home she directs her footsteps.

The next scene takes place six months later and shows the Gypsy maiden happily married to the wealthy stranger and living in the lap of luxury. We see them seated in their beautiful parlor when suddenly the strains of music and singing are heard from the outside of the house. The young woman going over to the window looks out and there to her great surprise she sees her old parents, who are street singers, standing in front of the mansion. She calls to them and beckons to the old folks to enter; then as she is about to send the butler out to let them in, her husband interferes and forbids her having communication with them. He gives orders to the butler to go down and order them away, which the latter does, but as he opens the gate the old man knocks him down and makes for the house to see his daughter. In the intervening time the young woman and her husband are having an altercation and in his anger he throws her to the floor. Her bohemian blood boils with rage and she follows her husband to the yard, where he is going to take a hand in ejecting the old people. The husband pushes the old man aside and then grapples with the old woman and as he does his enraged wife steps up and sinks a knife into his heart and he drops over dead. The trifled girl then embraces her old parents and starts with them to her old home in the Gypsy camp. Length, 436 feet.

MEPHISTO AND THE MAIDEN.—Friar Hugo, one day, chanced to cast his eyes through the narrow window of his gloomy cell, and was startled by the apparition of a maiden so passing fair that his eyes were blinded by her voluptuous beauty, and his soul so long confined in the charnel house of his melancholy brain leaped into life and harkened back to days of yore, when a youthful heart and an eager pulse were ever wont to quicken at the sight of beauty in a maiden fair. "Oh for an hour of sweet youth!" he cried. "Oh for one more fleeting moment of the world of life! of the world of song and joyous mirth!"

Now, Mephisto, the spirit of evil, who for so long had endeavored to crush the soul of this goodly man and drag it down to the realms of eternal damnation, saw in the maid a temptation strong enough to achieve his ends. So appearing before the friar he offered him two hours of youth and love with her by whose charms the aged recluse seemed enthralled, in exchange for which Friar Hugo must pledge his soul to Mephisto, to dwell forever in the domains of darkness and despair. "Away, thou tempter," cries the old philosopher. "Such things as life and beauty are not for me." "Behold this vision of enchanting beauty, my friend," replies the cunning devil, as with a wave of his fiery sword he produces the likeness of the maiden fair. "Wilt hesitate when such as she awaits thee?" "No, no," cries the trembling friar. "Her beauty is dazzling; my will is powerless before such temptation. Give me youth; give me two hours with her and I pledge my soul and my life to thy base will."

Singing the fatal bond of slavery, Friar Hugo turns to his tempter and with trembling eagerness awaits the dissolution of his withered frame and the resurrection of his youthful body.

With a fiendish laugh of exultation over his victory, Mephisto plunges his burning sword into the breast of the hermit, who with a shriek of anguish falls to the floor. Waving his magic blade over the prostrate form at his feet, Mephisto commands him to change his age for youth. Instantly a handsome young cavalier springs to his feet. It is Hugo, full of life and bouyancy; no longer a tottering old man, but a youth once more. "Now, away, out into the world, out of these gloomy walls to the life of beauty, love and chivalry." Placing his hand upon the shoulder of the eager youth, Mephisto springs into the air and the two disappear in vapor.

Now it chanced the Paulo, who had been removed by magic power from his sweetheart's presence to a far corner of the palace grounds, awoke to find himself alone and deserted by his heart's idol. Rushing away to seek her, he comes upon his fair one and young Hugo just as they are stepping from a gondola to wend their way to a lovers' retreat. Choking with rage Paulo challenges Hugo to cross swords with him, or relinquish the spell he holds over fair Viola. A fight ensues and Hugo is sorely pressed, when from out the air Mephisto appears, and unseen by the skilful young swordsman, Paulo, so parries the thrust and spoils his aim that Hugo is able to reach his mark and bury his weapon in the breast of the brave youth.

Hastening away with the still enchanted girl, Hugo soon forgets the dangerous encounter in the dazzling light of his lady's eyes, while poor Paulo, sorely wounded, is picked up by the palace guards and carried fainting into the presence of Manfried, Viola's father, who himself has just recovered from the mystic spell of the arch fiend.

Wild with rage and grief, the half-maddened father rushes away to find his daughter and avenge Paulo's wrongs.

Finding his daughter where Hugo had left her, Manfried raises her unconscious form in his arms and bears her back to the palace, where consciousness is restored to her, and as if awakening from some sweet dream she calls in vain upon him who had enthralled her heart and left her to die in sorrow.

Paulo still suffering from his wounds is brought into her presence, but she repulses his tender and loving solicitations. A vapory form arises between them; gradually it assumes the form of a man, and lo! Friar Hugo appears. Removing the evil spell the fiend had cast over the lives of these two lovers, he soon repairs the wrong done by healing the wounds of Paulo and restoring him to the good graces and love of his beautiful Viola. With a benediction upon their heads the old friar fades away, leaving the young lovers alone in their bliss. Length, 900 feet.

HIS FIRST GIRL.—The story opens in a skating rink, where Belle, a young girl of 16 or 17 years, has just finished skating. She stops to chat with a girl chum, when Fred, a lad of 18, comes up and is introduced to Belle. He is at once smitten, and, as both live in the same direction, he sees the girl safely on the car. They part at the corner. Fred is invited to call the next evening and starts for home supremely happy. On the following evening he dresses with more than usual care, and, leaving his room, feels in his pockets to find that he has but five cents. He goes to the sitting room, where the rest of the family are seated about, strikes first his father, then mother and finally his brother for some change, but in each instance meets with refusal. Little sister comes to the rescue with a quarter, and, as Fred starts out, the father gives him instructions to be home by 10 o'clock. At the young girl's home we find her putting the parlor to rights and preparing for the caller. He arrives on schedule time, is introduced to Belle's family, and is getting along famously when George, a boy of his own age and an old friend of the family, appears. He gives the little sister a quarter, and Fred, in order to keep his end up, does the same, and parts with his last bit of money. Belle shows plainly that she prefers Fred, but just the same he is jealous of George and wishes him most anywhere else. Ten o'clock arrives, the young lady's father gives orders for them to leave. The two boys go out together, and, on the steps, almost come to blows. They start off in opposite directions. Fred rushes to get a car, when, of a sudden, he remembers that he has no money and must walk the three miles home. On the way he is almost scared to death several times, reaches home at last and finds the door locked. As he climbs up the front porch, he is set upon by a policeman, but, when the mistake is discovered, the cop lends him a hand, Fred gets to the roof and crawls through the window. In his room the boy takes Belle's photo from his pocket, gazes lovingly at it, gets a good looking-glass and finds his moustache sprouting nicely and retires, feeling pretty well satisfied with himself. Length, 745 feet.

A BELATED MEAL.—John comes home on Saturday night with his week's salary, finding company awaiting him. After greetings have been exchanged, John's wife explains that there is nothing for dinner, so he starts out saying that he will return turn soon. He goes to his grocer, buys a chicken, some vegetables and groceries, and is on his way home when two friends waylay him and ask him to have a drink. They have several, and John starts homeward again, when he meets other friends who insist upon his drinking with them. He does not refuse, and by this time he is slightly under the weather, and staggers up the street with his companions. They part at the corner and John starts for home alone. The boys notice his condition, pelt him with snowballs and fasten his coat to the lamp-post.

At home his wife and friends are getting hungry and wonder what is keeping John. They finally get desperate and start out to locate him. He is soon sighted, taken to the house, where wifey sobers him up with a good beating. Length, 240 feet.

THE SCULPTOR'S LOVE.—A wealthy Irish gentleman and a French duke are talking earnestly in the home of the former as his daughter, dressed in a riding habit and accompanied by her maid, enters. The duke proposes to the young heiress and is spurned. The father, thinking of the title, compels his daughter to become engaged. She determines to have her own way, decides to change clothes with her maid and leaves for a week's vacation. A note is left for the father, and the lady and her maid depart. While walking along a country road, two men spring out and seize the young ladies. Help in the form of a young sculptor, son of an Irish innkeper, opportunely arrives, beats down the assailants and puts them to flight. He falls desperately in love with the maid, as he believes, but in reality the heiress, and to all appearances the feeling is reciprocated. He takes the young ladies to his father's hostelry and begs of the heiress to make a bust of her. Two days later we find the young lady in the studio posing. The sculptor tells of his love. The heiress debates for some time, finally yields, and they are in loving embrace as the irate father and duke burst into the room. The old gentleman scolds his daughter and upbraids the sculptor, and tells him that the girl is an heiress and engaged to the duke. The sculptor is dazed at this declaration, believes that the girl has been deceiving him, in rage denounces her, smashes the marble bust on the floor, orders her from the room, then sinks down brokenhearted. The two girls, the duke and father return home, where the heiress absolutely refuses to marry the duke, takes off his ring, tramples it beneath her feet, and rushes out for her lover's home. The young sculptor has brooded over his sorrow and decided to end it all. He takes a dagger from the table and is just about to bury it in his body as the heiress enters and prevents him. She then tells of her love, and the picture closes with the young heiress and her sculptor lover in fond embrace. Length, 465 feet.

THE MARATHON CRAZE.—In the Jones home the father is minding baby and at the same time absorbed in reading a newspaper account of a big Marathon race. As he reads he walks around the room, becomes more and more excited, the baby given less attention—in fact, positively neglected and mauled—as his wife enters, snatches the child from him and asks him if he is mad. He continues his jaunt around the table, wifey keeping pace while she scolds him. The servant is called in to take charge of the baby, and she also joins in the sprint. The old crippled grandmother, sitting in a rocking chair, is all excitement. In the boys' room the two sons are donning their running costumes, put on their overcoats and go to the dining-room, where all hands are by this time winded after the chase around the table. The boys tell that they are starting for the track. Father and the rest of the family follow—even the grandmother picks up her crutches and hobbles out. Down the street several neighbors are picked up, and the crowd starts for the track. They line up for the race, and at different points several of the contestants drop out exhausted. As the finish line is neared the old grandmother hobbles along in the lead, and finally crosses the tape a winner. The boys, who have dropped out some time before, pick her up and carry her away on their shoulders. Length, 440 feet.

CABIN BOY'S DOG.—A subject by the Raleigh & Roberts Company. The film opens by showing the only son of a family leaving home to go aboard a ship. We next see him on the shore, talking to the captain, who, at first, objects to having him take the dog, but at last consents. The next scene shows him sitting on the larboard side of the ship playing and kissing his dog. In the meantime the captain observes one of his sailors smoking a pipe, who objects to stop smoking at the command of the captain. The captain forcibly takes away the pipe from the sailor and throws it overboard. We next see the sailors in a group planning to kill the captain. The little cabin boy overhears their conversation and conveys his message to the captain, who goes after the crew with a pistol. They are frightened and remark that they will be good. But they do not, for they capture the little cabin boy and put him in a rowboat and leave him destitute on a barren island. In the meantime the captain notices that there is something wrong with the dog, who is vainly trying to get over the high fence at the side of the boat. The door is opened for the dog, who immediately jumps overboard, and the men follow quickly in pursuit. They discover the boy on the island, and so the film ends. Length, 453 feet.

A MARVELOUS OINTMENT (Ambrosio).—It opens by showing a man selling a medicine to make old persons young again. An old maid is the first to have the medicine applied. She jumps into the carriage and the doctor applies the salve on her face. In a few minutes the medicine is seen working—by taking out the wrinkles in her face and throwing away her old gray hair. She jumps out of the carriage a young girl again. Next is an old man; the medicine takes the same effect upon him. He sells quite a quantity of this medicine. He draws the crowd from the carriage a little, and while nobody is looking after the articles in the carriage, two tramps, standing nearby, jump into the carriage and meddle with the medicines in the carriage and apply the wrong salve. They take something to make their faces black. Meanwhile the doctor returns, notices same, applies the right kind of medicine and the two are finally arrested. Length, 466 feet.

BAILIF MEETS A SEIZURE.—This film opens by showing the interior of a poor man's cottage. He is sitting down by his wife, and they are penniless. We next see them in a barroom asking for money, which they are refused. They return home. The agent now appears and tells them that they will have to leave unless they can put up money enough for the rent. The agent leaves. In the meanwhile the husband thinks of a scheme. His wife gives him some powder and he places same on his face. He then jumps into bed, and his wife kneeling down beside him crys, when in comes the proprietor. The sight of the dying man has no effect upon his hard heart, when with lightning speed the dying man jumps out of bed onto the hardhearted proprietor, and frightens him out of the house. He kisses his wife, and so the film ends. Length, 433 feet.

RUNAWAY KIDS (Hepwix Company).—Opens by showing the interior of a wealthy family's home, and two little girls playing on the floor with the servant girl. She leaves them for a minute or so, and in the meantime one of them takes from the mantle a box containing money. They next prepare to run away; one combs the other's hair. We next see them in a very busy thoroughfare, asking a policeman the way to the railroad station. He directs them and one of the little girls kisses him. We next see them purchasing their tickets at the station, and they board a train. In the meantime the servant hunts all over for them. She tells the father and mother, and the three follow in pursuit. They happen to ask the same policeman as did the children, and he indicates the direction in which they had gone. They arrive in due time at the station to catch the next train. We next see the children at their destination. After leaving the train they are seen in a buffet, ordering some food which they are supplied with. In the meantime the father, mother and servant arrive, and they are directed to where the children are. They are prevented from going any further, and are given kisses by the mother and father, and so the film ends. Length, 475 feet.

THE DOG CAME BACK (Hepwix).—A tramp sells a dog to a man and is brought to his new home. The dog does not care for same and runs back to his master, who is sitting in a country lane. He is sold again to a pretty girl, and subsequently does the same trick. We next see the various buyers coming to the tramp and demanding their money back. The two men, after the departure of the pretty girl, give the man a severe handling, and subsequently a good ducking. Length, 300 feet.

A JILTED WOMAN'S REVENGE (Warwick Company).—A couple is seated outside of the girl's residence, making love. He subsequently takes her into her house and asks her father if he could marry his daughter. The father agrees. He is seen leaving the house, when just as he steps out he encounters the jilted woman, who follows him. We next see the couple going into church, and just as they are entering, the jilted woman appears and tries to prevent the marriage. She having failed, leaves. We next see the couple emerging from the church, and they are given a shower of rice by the relations and friends. In the meantime the father of the girl is taken suddenly ill, whereupon they call in a doctor and a nurse. The nurse is the jilted woman, who has disguised herself as an old lady of 60. She is next seen making up medicine for the sick man, but instead of medicine she is putting poison in a bottle. We next see the old man taking his medicine, and fall dead. The husband is accused of the murder and is placed in jail. In the meantime the nurse escapes, and while she is running away she encounters the daughter of the dead man on the top of a high precipice. She leaps down and pretty nearly kills herself. She is then taken in an automobile, the chauffeur of which is an old friend of ours—being W. G. Barker—and is taken into a room. She confesses everything, and the young husband is released. Length, 580 feet.

NANCY, OR THE BURGLAR'S DAUGHTER.—A Clarendon film. The daughter of a professional burglar loathes the life of deceit that she is compelled to lead, and after trying in vain to persuade her father to forsake his evil ways, she rushes from the house and decides to commit suicide by throwing herself into a river. A young curate, who is passing, observes the rash act and heroically dives over after the girl and brings her to shore and carries her to his home, where his mother brings her back to consciousness and she becomes an inmate of the curate's home. The curate marries the girl he befriended. One night while she is sitting asleep in a chair and the curate is out a burglar enters. She is awakened by the noise of breaking open a desk and starting up father and daughter stand face to face. While they talk the footsteps of the curates are heard approaching. Blood is thicker than water. She hides her father and takes the blame of the dismantled desk upon herself. But the burglar is discovered by the curate, and father and daughter confess all while she clings to her father instead of to her husband. But the curate forgives and the father repents and the final scene shows him as a trusted officer in the church of the curate.

LAZY JIM'S LUCK (Warwick).—A comedy which shows how everything comes to the hands of Lazy Jim. As he dresses he simply calls for his clothes or beckons to them and they jump into his hands. Popular wherever shown.

FOOLSHEAD LOOKS FOR A DUEL.—An Itala comedy which shows the force of example. A quarrel in a club room leads to a duel between two of the characters. Honor is satisfied by the usual "continental scratch" and the affair ends. Foolshead, however, has been a witness of the combat and is smitten with the duel fever, so a series of highly amusing scenes are witnessed in which Foolshead endeavors to get somebody to fight with him. Finally he gets a good beating for his pains, assaults the police and is arrested. A film with plenty of action.

RIP VAN WINKLE'S DREAM.—A re-issue of the famous fantasy by Melies, showing a Frenchman's idea of the well-known story by Washington Irving. Some remarkable examples of trick photography are seen in this film.

A THOUGHTLESS BEAUTY (Hepwix).—A giddy young lady is loved by two young men and cannot decide which one she will accept. While the three are at a picnic party she says that she will give her hand to the man who will be so brave as to gather a flower that grows on the side of a precipice. One tries it and falls. He is rescued by poles and carried to her home, where her parents severely chide her for her foolishness.

IT WAS A BEAUTIFUL DREAM.—A Lux film of of dramatic interest. The story shows the unhappy experiences of a beautiful girl in a succession of striking scenes. Her unhappiness at home, clandestine meetings with her lover and the interposition of parents who object to those meetings. The girl runs away and is seen to fall down, exhausted, in front of a cottage in the snow. She is taken inside, tended by the good woman of the house, and is given food, etc. The lover reappears in the scene and has an affecting interview with the girl. The girl is next seen alone in her bedroom, from which she escapes, but it is snowing outside, and she has many pathetic adventures in the snow before finally falling down unconscious. A series of well rendered scenes, photographically good and well acted, making altogether an interesting subject.

THE STOLEN LEGACY.—A Lux film on a familiar theme. A dying man commits his son to the care of his brother, who, however, robs the child and turns him adrift. Having got possession of all the money he gloats over it miserlike. While engaged in doing so, the apparition of his dead brother comes to him, and at the same time he sees in a vision his little nephew destitute in the streets. The boy, however, is rescued by kindly cottagers. There is a lapse of 15 years, and now we see the boy in the army. The uncle in his old age has become dissolute. The apparition of his dead brother comes to him once again, and the wicked man is conscience stricken. At this moment the apparition reappears, and then the tangible corporallity of the soldier boy who claims the money that was stolen from him. This the uncle restores, and the film ends by the boy forgiving him.

MASTER AND SERVANT.—An Itala subject of the costume kind. This piece is produced in very fine settings and narrates the adventures which befall an unscrupulous servant who supposedly kills his master, personates him, and finally is confuted by the reappearance of the man who he thought was killed. The film is crowded with plenty of incidents in the way of love, intrigue, plot and counter plot and generally has the effect of a romantic drama.

THE REGIMENTAL BARBER.—An Itala subject. The barber of an Italian cavelry regiment is something of a humorist. He does his work very expeditiously and the picture shows him to be a lightning artist. He shaves the soldiers in great batches, and the expressions on the faces of the victims of his art are exceedingly ludicrous. A comic sentry and much fun of the rough and tumble order are shown in the film, which is of the comic kind and likely to be provocative of laughter.

ROBIN HOOD AND HIS MERRY MEN is a Clarendon film which treats of a picturesque period of English history when the outlawed Earl of Huntington took to the woods, as we say in America, and with his merry archers had a good time in Sherwood Forest with winsome Maid Marian and jolly Friar Tuck. The adventures of Robin Hood makes an attractive subject for a pretty film.

THE DAMNATION OF FAUST (Melies).—Another rendition of the evergreen story of Marlowe and Goethe which has formed the theme of countless plays and many operas. Faust, it will be remembered, sold his soul to the devil in return for the fleeting joys of youth. He also has amorous adventures with the fair Margaret. It is a sombre subject which has inspired much fine writing and music and it should be popular on a film.

THE DEACON'S HOLIDAY.—Saturday, a day of work, sees the deacon in his office taking things easy. He is sitting in his comfortable chair, smoking a cigarette and life is a dream. Sunday, however, his day of rest, soon starts. The first thing in the morning the children wake up about 4 o'clock and raise a big noise, blowing horns, beating drums, etc., etc. The poor deacon next has to wash the dishes and then the family go out for a ride in the park. They all get into one carriage. After riding a short while, the horse is unable to pull the load, and the deacon must get out and push on the carriage. Then one of the wheels break. The deason runs off a short distance and borrows a push-cart from a peddler. All the children pile on the push-cart and the wife gets on the deacon's back, and he carries them home in this manner. He reaches home, exhausted by his day of rest. Monday, another work day, finds him at his office again, asleep in his chair. Length, 450 feet.

AUTOMATIC NURSING BOTTLE.—A baby's mother goes out, leaving it with its grandfather, an old knife-sharpener, who has a large rotary grindstone in his room. The baby starts to cry and the old man goes for its bottle of milk, but, unfortunately, drops it, and all his efforts to amuse the child and attract its attention away from the dinner are without avail. He finally hits upon a scheme of putting some milk in a can connected with a hose to the baby's mouth, and also puts a jumping jack on the grind-stone to amuse the baby. He then makes the grind-stone go fast and the milk is automatically pumped into the baby's mouth. Length, 167 feet.

NELLIE'S LOVE STORY. Nellie is a country lass, living in a small town in Italy, who is in love with a farmer, of whom her father disapproves. They run off to Rome, where Nellie becomes a painter's model and falls in love with her employer, forgetting, for a while, her farmer sweetheart. He is heartbroken and attempts suicide, but the attempt is unsuccessful and he staggers on until found by some compassionate peasants, who administer to his needs. They learn of his love affair and send for Nellie, who appears before him dressed up in splendid clothes. He does not know her in this garb, but when she dons the attire of a farmer's daughter, he recognizes her and they fall into each other's arms. Shortly after, they are married. Length, 750 feet.

VIOLETS.—The children of a rich family are out walking with their mother, when they pass the home of a poor little shepherdess, who has a large quantity of violets around her. They wish to get some violets and the little shepherdess leads them to the place where the violets grow. Christmas time comes and the two children are having a joyous time, but the poor little shepherdess is sick. When spring returns the children go again to pick violets and then think of the little shepherdess, whom they go to visit. They enter the house and find her dying, and kneel down and pray. Length, 420 feet.

CENTAUR FILM COMPANY, 1873 Park Ave., New York City

CENTAUR FILM COMPANY.

THE COWBOY'S SWEETHEART.—For their first offering to the moving picture public the Centaur Company have wisely chosen a subject which, while being easily understood by the people, is also likely to be generally popular. In this they show great wisdom for, as recent experience has demonstrated, it is an easy thing to produce pictures which, while full of highly technical and dramatic qualities, are yet above the heads of those who look at them. In other words, they lack the power of attracting and holding popular attention. The theme of this film is, after all, a simple one. It shows how course of true love between the cowboy and his sweetheart does not run smoothly. Villainy interposes the usual obstacles, and for a time it looks as if the lovers were to be eternally parted, especially at the crucial moment of the play, when the villainousness outlaws secure and bind the hero and suspend him in a treacherous quicksand in which he is soon in process of being engulfed. But now the heroine appears and hangs onto the rope and so prevents her lover from being drawn under the sand. From this perilous position he is rescued by the loyal cowboys, and finally the lovers are united outside the door of the humble cabin, which is the scene of the opening of the little drama. The story, of which we have given the main theme, is full of incident, movement and action. In these respects, if the Centaur Company continue as they have commenced, they will deserve well of moving picture patrons, who, above all things, need, as has been pointed out recently in these pages, action, action, action all the time. The picturesque side of cowboy life in the field is shown, and there are many exciting pursuits, contests, adventures, both on horseback and a-foot, so that the picture has considerable variety of effect. The whole film is, in fact, crowded with incidents which spring naturally one from the other, another respect in which the Centaur Company show great dramatic acumen. It is too often the case that in a moving picture film an incident is, as it were, dragged in by the "head and ears."

The indoor and outdoor scenes have been well chosen. The costumes fit the piece, the actors have been well rehearsed in their movements, both on horseback and on foot, and the result is a very effective bit of cowboy life and adventure such as we think will be well received wherever it is shown.

Photographically regarded the picture must be given high praise. The Centaur Company seem determined to arrive at the best results in this important respect. Its length is 870 feet and it is to be released on May 8.

INTERNATIONAL PROJECTING AND PRODUCING CO.

"The independent film renter is scouting like mad for second-hand films. This is proof enough that the average independent does not intend to become a regular purchaser of the regular weekly output of the independent manufacturer, but intends to buy only when it suits him. This tendency in itself means failure for any concerted independent movement, and the Moving Picture Patents Company knows this and therefore they can afford to smile at the grandiloquent promises made by the Independents and the fierce threats made against the Trust. The simple, solid truth is that the vast number of exchanges that claim to be independent are running on the mangiest of junk and the outcry of their subscribers is painful. Already the business of many independent shows has been ruined and some of them are closing their doors."

The above paragraph appeared in the Moving Picture World on page 361, issue of March 27, 1909, under the caption of "Observations by Our Man About Town," and is the cause of our publishing the above offer. This paragraph was probably published with a view of ridiculing the INDEPENDENT movement and INDEPENDENT exchange. As this article has appeared, we wish to say, as America's Largest Film Exchange, either TRUST or INDEPENDENT, that the facts published are, in the main, true. There are many small wild-cat exchanges representing themselves as being Independent which are really the back door of some TRUST film exchange who are endeavoring to make their "junk" film earn them something.

In securing INDEPENDENT service, Mr. Exhibitor, you want to be sure that you are dealing with an exchange that is INDEPENDENT and buying INDEPENDENT film, and not endeavoring to palm off on you their old Trust "junk" film.

As the best proof of our ability to handle your account with new Independent films and to prove our responsibility to you, we refer you to

I Am Now Doing the Biggest and Best Film-Renting Business in the World!

—Fighting, fighting, fighting every inch of the way I have finally built up the grandest film-renting business in the world.

—Through stress and storm, through plots and counterplots, in spite of Trials, Tribulations, Troubles and Trusts, I have forced my way to the very tip top, using one motto, one idea, one grand slogan—"QUALITY."

—I am still being deluged with letters and telegrams regarding my announcement of independence and in every instance they are wildly enthusiastic and encouraging.

—Scores of exhibitors have said: "God bless you." Other scores have said: "We'll stick by you no matter what comes!"

—I never saw such deep feeling in my life. I never knew a set of men to be so aroused as the exhibitors are. I never saw such mighty, irresistible determination to conquer all odds and come out triumphant.

—We have called the most monumental BLUFF that was ever worked. We have forced the enemy to show his hand. And what has he shown? A royal flush? No. A straight? No. Nothing on earth but a bob-tailed flush and dealt from a cold deck at that!

—The license is D-E-A-D!

—AND NOW FOR THE GRANDEST ERA OF PROSPERITY IN THE HISTORY OF THE MOVING PICTURE BUSINESS!

—Forget your past troubles. Laugh at the lies you will hear! Roll up your sleeves. Hunch up your shoulders and get busy!

—I will take care of every order I get, no matter if I have to buy five thousand dollars' worth of films per day, no matter how fast you send in your orders—and I will give you the best films and the best service you ever dreamed of.

—The International Projecting & Producing Co. is about to release the most magnificent batch of films ever shown—far better than the first assortments. Get in now and get these new features! Write!

"FORGOTTEN"

Drama. Approximate Length, 490 Feet.
RELEASE, WEDNESDAY, MAY 5, 1909.

This story illustrates the anguish of a young sailor who after a series of misfortunes, covering a period of many years, returns to his home and finds that his sweetheart, whose memory urged him to renewed efforts despite almost insurmountable difficulties, has transferred her affections to another and that he has been entirely forgotten.

Before starting on the eventful voyage the young sailor celebrates his engagement in sumptuous manner. The vessel sails and the maiden waves a tender farewell to her betrothed.

Not long after one of the other sailors returns with news of a serious disaster at sea and the probable loss of all on board. Momentarily, the grief is intense, but as time goes on the tender heart again assumes its natural buoyancy and the maiden receives the attentions of other admirers.

Several years have elapsed and another engagement is celebrated. An unkind fate at this moment allows the appearance of the former betrothed. Years of hardship and toil have been endured by him to be able to return to home and happiness, but the bitter disappointment and anguish of his soul is portrayed in his features as he peers through the window of the home, where he was wont to call and while away his leisure hours, and sees that he has been forgotten and all memory of him a thing of the past.

"THE PEDDLER'S REWARD"

Drama. Approximate Length, 463 Feet.
RELEASE, WEDNESDAY, MAY 5, 1909.

In a cluster of woods not far from his home a farmer is cutting timber and is accidentally caught under a falling tree. Fortunately his little daughter is at hand and she hurriedly rushes to the road where she meets a peddler whom she begs for assistance. This is not denied and the unfortunate father is soon rescued from his precarious position and conveyed to his home on the back of the peddler's donkey.

The same day the little girl meets two vagrants leading the donkey laden with the peddler's wares. She seeks and finds the peddler, who is greatly excited because of his loss, having been asleep at the tavern when his property was taken from him. The alarm is sounded and the men taken into custody.

The story beautifully illustrates the adage, "A Kind Action is Never Lost."

GAUMONT FILMS

GEORGE KLEINE

Licensed by Motion Picture Patents Co.

"NEW PAIN KILLER"

Comedy. Approximate Length, 370 Feet.
RELEASE, SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1909.

A rip-roaring comedy sure to win a storm of applause. Sauntering down the street a young man experiences a severe attack of toothache and hurries into a dentist's office to have the offending tooth extracted. Instead, however, the doctor quiets the nerve by a spray of antiseptic fluid. The pain disappears as if by magic, but the entire body becomes insensible to pain.

Reading the paper as he leisurely walks along he attempts to cross the street and is run down by a passing carriage, but he gets up and finds no harm done him by the accident.

Later he approaches a fortress where he is met by a guard with the "Halt! Who goes there?" which he ignores entirely and thereupon the guard pierces him with the bayonet, but even this causes him no concern and he smilingly continues his path to the utter consternation of the guard.

Soon after he is attacked by several highwaymen who beat him up severely and most brutally, but he arises after the conflict and goes on about his business without the least concern.

In the terrace of a cafe the waiter drops a tray of glassware upon our friend, but this causes him no worry, and after paying his bill he saunters on.

The strength of the antiseptic spray, however, having been dissipated, our friend again experiences his toothache and in apparently a more violent form than before, and when shortly after a pedestrian runs into him it so arouuses his ire that he attacks him furiously, shaking him up in the same manner as a dog would a rat.

The comedy hit of the season.

"FOUR FOOTED HAWKSHAW"

Drama. Approximate Length, 590 Feet.
RELEASE, SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1909.

A dramatic presentation especially illustrating remarkable canine sagacity.

Farmer Lorin returning with cattle meets Vallon, his landlord, who calls for his rent. Lorin tells him he will be able to pay in two days as he expects to sell some of his cattle at the county fair the next day. Lorin takes his cattle to the fair and succeeds in making sale thereof. Seated at a table he counts the money received and taking a drink returns to his home. Picard, a friend, seated at the same table observes Lorin putting away his money and follows at a distance. Upon arriving at his home Lorin secretes his money in the bottom of the cupboard and retires. Picard watching at the window soon also enters and takes the money, departing by way of the window. Hurrying to the woods he hides his booty under a tree and returns to his home.

The following day Vallon calls and when Lorin goes to get his money its loss is discovered, causing great consternation. The police are called and a detective is given charge of the case. The latter takes his dog and the two are soon on the ground where the dog takes the most active part in tracing the thief. By a peculiar incident the dog locates the thief and then follows him as he goes to the woods to find the money secreted the night before. The detective and police following the trail catch him as he is digging up the ill-gotten treasure. The story concludes with a view of the detective and the dog. Excellent photographic quality and extraordinary effects in night scenes.

"Quality"

We are pleased to note the frequency with which the word that heads this short article has made its way into the current phraseology of the moving picture field. It's quality first, last and all the time. Film manufacturers are talking quality, thinking quality, and, fortunately, producing quality. Some of them would have us suppose, and probably persuade themselves, that they have made a new discovery. Not so. They are simply echoing, unconsciously, we believe, the battle cry that was first raised in these pages some three months ago.

Alone amongst those who have charge of the American film interests in the press we pointed out that the contest which was recently entered upon was one of quality, and our reiteration of this undoubted fact has, we are pleased to notice, thoroughly penetrated the minds of those responsible for the making of moving pictures. Never before in the history of this branch of industry was the fact recognized, and we take credit to ourselves for having been instrumental in awakening the manufacturing conscience to it. When the "tumult and the shouting" of the squabblers, to which reference was recently made in this paper, has died away the battle of quality will and must remain to be fought. The Moving Picture World alone, amongst its contemporaries, assumes the office of keeping watch over the technical and dramatic qualities of moving picture films, in the interests of manufacturers, renters, exhibitors and the public. In carrying out that work, we are conscious of doing in a practicable way something which makes our pages of unique value to all interested. "Quality, quality, Mr. Manufacturer, and again quality, and always quality."

Wanted: A New F. S. A.

SECOND ARTICLE.

Our article of April 17th, under this heading, was, it seems, a timely one. The old F. S. A. is dead or moribund; or, at any rate, it is doing nothing, and so our suggestion that it should be killed outright and a new one formed in its place is the logical outcome of events. Since we wrote, we have been at some pains to ascertain whether the views we put forth commended themselves to the moving picture field. Well, they do. From all quarters of America we have received verbal and other assurances that a Film Service Association is more than ever needed. For we live in curious times. A great and growing industry has recently been disrupted, and instead of things straightening themselves out, as it was expected would be the case, they are doing nothing of the sort; in fine, to quote the refrain of a popular song, "We do not know where we are."

What do we see? The moving picture field is rent in opposing camps, neither well organized nor seeming to know where it is bound. Certainly it would be difficult from recent developments for any human being, however wise, to say what will be the outcome of the policy of those who profess to entertain such philanthropic regard for the "uplift" of the moving picture. The uplift, at any rate, may be in process of achievement. We hope and believe it is. The exact status of those, however, who rely upon the exploitation of the moving picture as a business, is no clearer than it was before. Certainly it is no surer.

On the other hand, the Independents, or rather those who very properly claim full personal liberty for the lawful exercise of their business, is hardly satisfactory. They are simply scattered units in the field, so full of Independence that their independence of each other while making for unity of object seems likely, we apprehend, to defeat that object. In other words, there is no union where there should be union.

It cannot be said that even the manufacturers are united. The list of manufacturers that is published by no means represents the total number of those engaged in the commercial production of films in the United States to-day; indeed, the non-licensed manufacturers outnumber the licensed. Then there are the importing firms and importing manufacturers, very important factors in the situation; and again, there are the several hundreds of rental agencies throughout the country, most of them now Independent; lastly, there are the thousands of exhibitors. A very imposing industrial army it will be perceived! Now it is easy to realize that unless these various interests can harmonize and be made inter-independent one on the other, disunion and mutual destruction will be the ever present danger. Broadly speaking there are three sets of interests to reconcile: (1) Manufacturers and importers. The interests of these are identical. (2) Film renters and exchanges. (3) Exhibitors. In our view of things the last class is perfectly well able to take care of itself. It is the most numerous; it makes the most money, and it can the more easily combine if action is demanded of it. Number one, the manufacturers, can also easily get in touch with each other and co-operate for mutual benefit. To some extent they have already done so, and it remains to be seen whether the future will bring them all into line, instead of, as at present, seeing them in hostile camps. Number two, the renters, presents, of course, the most difficult of the problems. The renter really holds the key to the situation. He is indespensable. It is a dream to suppose that in modern commerce a distributing agent is unnecessary. To talk of bringing manufacturer and consumer into direct contact without the interposition of a middle man, argues unfamiliarity with modern business requirements. So it is no more possible in the film business than it is in other branches of industrial production. That being the case we must assume that the renter will always be a personal factor in the situation. Upon him, therefore, devolves the moral necessity of adjusting the perfect equilibrium which should exist between production and distribution.

Consequently we look upon the renter as the most important factor in the film situation at the present time. It is he who should control the output, regulate prices, suppress duping, prevent price cutting, eliminate undesirable theaters, limit the number, look after the legislatures in their dealings with the moving picture industry, and generally take a constant and active interest in everything affecting the progress of the moving picture industry. These matters should be left neither to an extraneous company, a few manufacturers, or to widely scattered exhibitors. They should be in the hands of a strong and authoritative film service association representative of renters all over the country and officered by powerful and level-headed business men. Now who will take the formation of this association in hand? Swanson, Miles, Laemmle, Lieber, it is up to you. The eye of America is upon you and you are looked to to give the moving picture field an association, active, strong, militant and progressive, worthy of the name. Will you do it?

CHANGING FILMS.

Managers are making a mistake in changing their films daily. Or, perhaps, it would be better to say that they are making a mistake to change their entire programme every day. A good many films deserve a longer run than one day. They are good enough to draw business for three days at the shortest, possibly a week in some instances. There is little incentive for manufacturers to make up good films. They last only a day, and the poorest draws in that length of time as well as the best.

After the first day's run it might be that some films should be eliminated, not necessarily because they are bad, but because they may not please the audiences which gather in a particular theater. The individuality of audiences plays an important part in the popularity of films, more, perhaps, than is usually conceded.

Where a film is good and has satisfied the attendants at a theater it ought to have a longer life than one day. That is altogether too ephemeral. It does not permit accurate judgment as to its drawing qualities, and is simply another indication of the competition which is urging managers to undertake to draw custom through advertising a complete change of programme every day, regardless of the films shown in many instances.

This will have a tendency to injure their business and it should be discontinued. Make selections after the first day, but if a film has pleased the first day it is quite likely to do so the second and the profits of your theater should increase accordingly. Go back to the former twice a week change. It is more sensible and affords opportunity for a good film to be seen by many more people who would undoubtedly enjoy it. The [illegible] will be eliminated by their own unworthiness.

Savannah, Ga., May 1.—The New Airdome which was built by the Bandy Brothers, Messrs. Frank and Hubert, opened up on Monday and played to more than ten thousand people during the evening. When seen Frank Bandy said: "We are giving to the people in Savannah more vaudeville and moving pictures than any other house in the country to-day. Our charges, which are ten and twenty cents, are low enough for anyone, and our vaudeville, which includes more than twelve people in our vaudeville acts, is of the best that can be brought south of the Mason and Dixon line. The Airdome is as popular as was the Superba when it first opened, and as this is the first one that has ever been put up in Savannah, the Bandy Brothers are sure to make good with it with the people of Savannah.

The Roof Garden which is being put up on Bull street, one of Savannah's main streets, will be ready and opened for business during the latter part of next week.

The Modern Way in Moving Picture Making.

CHAPTER VIII.

Some Defects of the Negative.

A perfect negative is seldom, if ever, made, notwithstanding the ignorant dictum of the stupid persons who assert the contrary. Pictures are produced which contain a greater or less number of imperfections, mostly the former, but rarely do you see a negative in which you cannot, metaphorically speaking, "pick holes." A negative is, or should be, a perfect rendering in properly graduated monochrome of the lights and shadows of the original. This is what it mostly is not. The reason is, that the teaching of the previous chapter was disregarded. The ills to which the negative is heir are numerous; some of them may be specified as the result of an average of experience. To mention them all would mean the inclusion of rarer kinds of trouble, which do not occur generally enough for specific mention. A foggy condition of the negative indicates either that the film was not properly handled either before or during development. The light may have been unsafe; the developer too strong; exposure too much. Seldom is a foggy film sent out from the factory. The last person to blame is the manufacturer. Whenever a film is found too foggy, search for the origin of the fault in the camera, exposure, the light, or the developer. I have made hundreds of tests on films alleged to be foggy by the manufacturer, and I have always traced the cause to one of the four sources just mentioned.

Opaque spots on the negative are due to dirt in the developer, metallic particles in the water or in the developing vessels or to dust in the room, in short, "matter in the wrong place." Particles of iron in the water very frequently cause these spots. They attack the silver salt in the film, reduce it, and cause those little black marks which appear white in the positive, and look so inelegant on the screen. Filter, filter, filter all the time is my advice. Again, see that the developer is properly mixed up, dissolved, filtered and kept clean; see that it is not allowed to weaken in action; use plenty of it at the proper temperature, and at the proper strength. It is cheap enough.

If the hypo solution is dirty you will also get spots and scummy marks on the negative. Filter that hypo, and by frequent use of the hydrometer, see that it is of the proper strength. Above all things, work closely to the instructions of the manufacturers of the film, whoever they may be. Use their formula, and do not experiment with your own, unless you thoroughly understand the underlying principles of the chemical side of development. Not one man in a thousand knows what they are. Not one photographer in five thousand knows exactly what he is using, and why he is using it. He is not a chemist. If he tries to be one, he only succeeds in being a fool for his pains. Next to fog and little spots on the picture another common defect is unevenness of deposit, showing in the positive light and dark patches. Well, the development has not been evenly done. The solution has not been allowed to act on the film evenly and regularly, consequently some parts of the negative will be made denser than the other, with the results described. The remedy is obvious. Sometimes the negative comes up quickly and the image is slightly veiled, flat and without contrast. This is caused by over exposure. Sometimes the high lights of the negative come up and the halftones and shadows refuse to gain density. Result: in the positive too much contrast or black and white effect; the black is too black, the white is too white. This is caused by under exposure. Where a film is known to be under exposed, detail can be brought out by prolonging the development preferably in a diluted solution. Similarly in the case of over exposure, development can be retarded and density built up by diluting the solution and the judicious use of restraining bromide.

But, as prevention is better than cure, test a small strip of the film exposed before putting the whole length on the developing drum or frame. Then the developer can be adjusted accordingly. When the photographer comes to develop his picture, he should know exactly why it is correctly under or over exposed; nothing should be left to chance. Sometimes through under development, a negative may be full of detail, and yet give not sufficient density in the positive. Then it will need intensifying. Whatever process of intensification may be adopted (and they are numerous, not calling for individual mention) care must be taken to free the film from all traces of hypo and other impurities. For, if there are any of these defects in the negative, it will intensify them, and they will show in the positive. But, again, intensification should not be required. The correct development of a correctly exposed film is, nowadays, such a simple matter in a well equipped factory that the necessity of intensification argues either carelessness or incompetency on the part of the staff.

A slight veiling on the negative, a slight fog due to over exposure, bad light or improper development is of common occurrence. It can be got rid of by passing the negative through a solution of what is known as Farmer's reducer, ferridcyanide of potassium and hypo. The careful use of this brightens up the negative, and makes it a better printer. Here I would like to say that in assuming the negative is developed on a revolving drum passing through a trough of solution, I am not saying that this is the only way of doing the work. I perceive that there are other methods of an antediluvian kind used by American film makers. For example: winding the film around a rectangular wooden frame and suspending it in a big tray of solution. This is a cumbersome and primitive plan, which I saw in use in England twelve years ago. If the revolving drum system cannot be availed of, a simpler, but none the less effective, plan can be devised by building grooved vertical tanks or troughs for developing, washing and fixing the film in rectangular frames. Then you can be handling six or twelve frames at once, and in the course of a day the output will be largely augmented. The up-to-date professional portrait photographer uses grooved porcelain tanks or troughs. In these, at the end of the day, he develops his negatives for a certain fixed time in a standard developing solution at a fixed temperature. He washes and fixes on the same plan; and so he makes his process of development almost an automatic one. This is precisely what I am suggesting in this article that the film photographer should do. I find that I have overrun my allotted space this week and I will defer another part of this chapter until next week.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

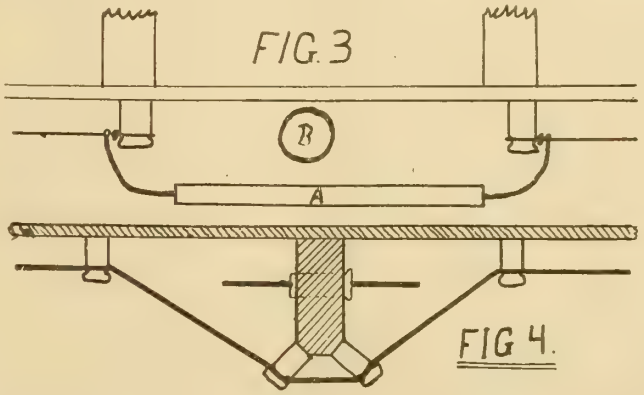
CHAPTER III.

In running wires along a wall it is often necessary to pass a metal pipe which the knobs will not be long enough to allow the wires to clear. This should be taken care of as per Fig. 3.

A is hard rubber insulating tubing. B is the pipe.



Another electric wire of opposite polarity may be crossed in the same manner. A joist or timber may be passed as shown in Fig. 4 or the wire may be run directly through it by insulating with porcelain, glass or hard rubber tubing.

In making a wire splice, or joint, it is of the utmost importance that it be done right, since a poorly made joint will invariably heat, with consequent loss of power and liability to eventually burn off. Fig. 5 shows some of the ways of making different joints in wire. "A" shows the right and wrong way to skin a wire. If done as at 1 you are likely to cut a slight ring around the wire and this will cause it to break very easily. "B" shows the "Western Union" joint which is most used by wiremen. Invariably use two plyers in making this joint and pull it up perfectly tight. "C" shows the proper method of tying a wire to an insulating knob. Use wire (without removing the insulation) the same size as the line you are tying. At "D" is seen the proper method of making a splice in a twin wire. When the joint is done 1 and 2 should be wrapped with insulating tape after which the whole length from which the outer insulation has been removed must be thoroughly taped. Twin wires (two insulated wires enclosed in one outer insulation) should be used only in metal conduits. To make a splice in a flexible cable strip the insulation from about three inches of each end. Clean the strands thoroughly and separate the wires of each end into about four equal parts two-thirds of the way back to the insulation. Now put the ends together so that the strands of each end will come between each other and wrap them down tight and solder.

Before making a wire joint always CLEAN THE WIRES PERFECTLY, scraping them until they shine. It is impossible to make good electrical contact unless the metal is perfectly clean. After making a wire joint always cover with insulating tape at least as deep as the original insulation.

To solder a joint first heat the wires with a gasoline torch and rub on a soldering compound, which may be had in stick form from electrical supply houses. Then, using solder wire, melt sufficient solder by holding the solder to the joint and playing the flame on it to thoroughly fill the splice. Care should be had not to heat the wires, especially if small ones, too hot, as it has a tendency to weaken them. Those who cannot secure soldering compound may make a flux as follows: Saturated solution of zinc chloride 5 parts, alcohol 4 parts and glycerine 1 part. A well-made joint may be used temporarily without soldering, but a permanent joint should ALWAYS BE SOLDERED.

Before leaving this branch of the subject of wiring I will tell you how to figure the resistance of wires. You probably will never need to use the rule, but for the sake of completeness I will supply the information. Electrical calculations having to do with wires are based on the "circular mil." The term really means the cross section of a circle 1-1000 of an inch in diameter. The resistance of a commercial copper wire having a length of one foot and a cross section of one mil is 10.8 ohms. This resistance increases as the length increases and decreases as the cross section increases. In other words, the longer the wire the more resistance, and the larger it is the less resistance it offers to a given current. To find the resistance any copper wire will offer you simply multiply its length in feet by 10.8 and divide the product thus obtained by the number of circular mils the wire contains. To turn this rule to practical account we must go further. To find the size wire necessary to transmit any given current a given distance with a certain percentage of loss proceed as follows: Multiply the number of amperes by the total number of feet of wire in both legs of the circuit and multiply this by 10.8. Multiply the voltage by the percentage of loss you propose to allow and

THEIR POLICY AND PROCEDURE.

Last week the Motion Picture Patents Company accomplished a very important work for both exhibitor, exchange and the picture-loving public, when it succeeded in killing a bill in the Senate, which, if passed, would have closed every picture theater in New York State. The bill made it a misdemeanor to use celluloid films in any moving picture machine, apparatus or device.

Now comes the announcement from the same concern that it has brought about the death of a bill in the New Jersey Legislature, which would have made it a misdemeanor for an exhibitor to admit girls under sixteen between the hours of 6 p. m. and 8 a. m., and girls under fourteen at any time of the day unless accompanied by parent or guardian. The Patents Company contends that, under the reform which it is bringing about, such as the "censored" films, clean, well-ventilated theaters, and lights on during the show, the motion picture offers advantages of education and entertainment especially desirable for children, and believes this principle should be encouraged.

To date, the Board of Censorship, composed of civic bodies and instituted by the Motion Picture Patents Company, which controls over five thousand motion picture theaters in the United States and ninety per cent. of the film product of the world, has examined 200,000 feet of film. After the film has been approved it is released to the hundred licensed exchanges throughout the country who distribute it to the theaters. A reel of film averages about one thousand feet, and includes one, two and sometimes three subjects. Eighteen new reels are released each week. At the average speed of operation, fourteen separate pictures pass the eye every second that the machine is in motion. Thus the censors have seen about 46½ miles of film and at the rate of twenty minutes running time for each thousand feet, have looked upon 3,360,000,000 separate pictures.

Scenes depicting crime, brutality, depravity, sensuality or drunkenness are condemned and cut out.

At the last meeting only 24 feet out of 18,000 feet examined was discarded.

The manufacturers study the discarded sections and do not repeat similar errors. They have been quick to realize the real demand and are eager to supply it. It will be a matter of but a few weeks when they will know exactly what is regarded as good and what bad according to the high moral standard of the Censorship Board and will produce only such films, thus leaving no further work for the Board to do.

Whitefish, Mont.—P. J. McCabe has leased the building which is being erected by A. E. Knight, for a family theater.

St. Louis, Mo.—The Consolidated Construction and Amusement Company has been organized, with a capital stock of $[illegible], by William H. Miltenberger, W. V. Gerasche and others for the purpose of erecting and operating a chain of nickel theaters throughout the country.

Ely, Minn.—The Northern Amusement Company has opened a new moving picture theater in the Miller Building; it will be known as the Elco Theater.

OBSERVATIONS BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

The meeting held in Carnegie Hall, New York City, on Saturday, 24th inst., to give vent to a public sentiment in behalf of a more liberal Sunday was not, as many supposed, a movement engineered by the moving picture exhibitors, although they were very much interested in the project from the standpoint of individual interest. Some of the reporters were a little too enthusiastic in their reports of the meeting. There were enough seats for all present. Conservatively, a third more than those in attendance could have been accommodated with seats. Considering the import of the affair to people who have an interest in a regulation that will permit proper and wholesome entertainment for the masses on Sunday the attendance was surprisingly small. This will be accounted for in later paragraphs.

The Carnegie Hall meeting was an inspiration of the blue stockings of the city's population. The Vanderbilts, Astors, Goelets and others of the upper strata want a liberal Sunday and are the founders of the Liberal Sunday League. They hired the hall, paid for the band, and made themselves generally useful. The Patents Company was taken in as a sort of advisory asset and through that company the moving picture exhibitors were supplied with tickets. That the meeting was not a howling success was due to one or all of the following reasons: First, there was an insufficiency of newspaper and poster advertising; second, on the tickets distributed was the announcement that tickets of admission could be had free of charge at the box-office; third, the exhibitors themselves could have crowded the hall with but little exertion had they been fully informed as to the purpose of the meeting. They have been trimmed so frequently during the past few months that they feared the meeting was a scheme to make them show how much sporting blood they had in them.

Being in the newspaper business, we are too modest to dwell upon the first mistake. As to the second, it is permissible to state that if you want to keep anybody from a gathering hand out a "comp" that bears no evidence of value. Had the tickets distributed carried an imprint of something like "50 Cents" and then over the face a red line reading "Complimentary," many who did not attend would have paid carfare to get something for nothing.

The meeting was a good one. The speakers were few, but able. It might be said that they were more than able. The vocabularies were apparently unlimited and the ability to fill in time ample. The pictures offered were good and very suitable, but the projection of them was below the standard, due, it is said, to the low voltage on the circuit.

Taken as a whole, the meeting was not a success. It is understood that another is to be held. If this is true the arrangements should be placed in more practical hands and advertised better. To secure proper co-operation in such movements there must be adequate publicity as to the time, place and object.

In reporting the Carnegie Hall meeting some reporters have stated that it was designed to give expression of public sentiment against the Blue Laws. Such was not the case. If the laws referred to were under considered no in- or outdoor place would accommodate the mass of people ready to renounce them. Such laws lie upon the statutes ignored by all classes. The Liberal Sunday movement is aimed against the modern schemes to enforce observance of the Sabbath against particular forms of amusement and enterprise. The toboggans, the merry-go-rounds, shoot the chutes and hundreds of other devices that cause merriment of a most hilarious character go on forever, but the nickelodeon must be silent. The side doors of the saloon operated by those having influence can swing from dawn to nightfall, but all others must be closed. Athletic sports can be held in many places on the same conditions. Baseball may be played if no admission fee is charged. The ice cream, peanut and sandwich stands crowd the streets wherever crowds are likely to pass or form. The discrimination is glaring. If the nickelodeons were thrown open on Sundays under proper supervision there would be a far less number of arrests on those days than there are at present. A genuine Liberal Sunday movement with a little less silk stocking color and more consideration for the masses would eventually convince the authorities of this.

The Board of Censorship has issued a pamphlet giving a full list of the officers and setting forth in a very interesting manner the objects of the association. A change in the secretaryship is noticed. The former secretary is now in the employ of the Motion Picture Patents Company.

If the Patents Company cannot legally confiscate the subjects of its manufacturers when exhibited in places that are not licensed by the company it seems strange that the company is scoring in so many replevin suits. In one court the company secured judgments against two unlicensed exhibitors during the past week. A marshal seized a Vitagraph and a Pathe film that were shown in a West Side nickelodeon. The exhibitor had a chance to appear in court to fight the replevin, but neither he nor the exchange from whom he rented the films were present and the court signed a decree affirming the seizure.

If all the nickelodeons were controlled by Jews and all the patrons were of the same faith the argument as to why the people of that faith should be obliged to observe the first day of the week as well as the seventh would have more weight in behalf of the motion picture exhibitors than it has. Unfortunately, there are thousands upon thousands of people of other faiths who have Sunday alone to depend upon for recreation and cannot fall back upon the argument against an enforced double Sabbath observance. It would not be fair to say that a Jew may open his nickelodeon on the first day because he observed the Sabbath on the seventh day, according to his faith, and that all people of similar faith might patronize him. Imagine one man taking in the money while his next-door neighbor is obliged to remain closed because he did not observe the Sabbath on the seventh day! By the way, how many nickelodeons are found closed on Saturdays? Don't send in your answers in a bunch.

Developments of the past week indicate that the strain under which the licensed film exchanges have been operating on account of the royalties imposed by the Patents Company will be so much relieved after May 1st that business will soon assume normal shape. The arrangement by which the royalties may be paid weekly instead of monthly in advance is generally accepted with favor and manufacturers report that trade is strengthing. How long this hopeful aspect will continue is problematical, so far as the exchanges are concerned, as some of them are already charging that the royalties are being paid and not charged against the exhibitors. One accused exchange declares that the charge is groundless; that in cases where it is supposed the exchange is paying the royalty the exhibitor is really doing it, although his bill does not show it. In other words, the exhibitor is paying so much for his service and not bothering about the royalty. "Where ignorance is bliss it is folly to be wise."

Evidently none of the moving picture people have traveled to Albany with the dough bag. None of the bills affecting them have been heard from the past week publicly, but intimations from private sources are to the effect that public opinion is very much opposed to that class of entertainment. A test of the pulse indicates that the exhibitors are indifferent to results. They have been called upon for payments from so many quarters during the past eight or ten months that it seems to be of little concern to them whether or not they keep open. These are the sentiments of most of them. Whether or not they are sincere is open to discussion, but the exhibitors cannot be blamed for balking at the dough bag.

OLIVER.

Toledo, Ohio.—The United States Amusement Company is the name of the new theatrical merger launched recently in Toledo. Capital, $10,000. It will operate over thirty theaters in different parts of the country. Moving pictures and vaudeville will be the chief attractions.

Hanover, Pa., falls in line with one of the up-to-date moving picture parlors with seating capacity of 360 opera chairs. The theater is to be built especially for that purpose by Westfall & Nydegger, of Elkins, W. Va., and will be one solid mass of plaster ornaments and statues, some of them standing as high as 7 and 10 feet. Opens June 1.

Dayton, Ohio.—The first moving picture show to be established in South Park will be opened at the corner of Oak and Brown streets, a license having been issued to the South Park Theater Company, to Keen. This section of the city, one of the most densely populated, is the only suburb which has not been represented in the moving picture line.

SEEMINGLY NEGLECTED OPPORTUNITIES FOR MOTION PICTURES.

If you have ever been in the American Museum of Natural History, in New York City, you should know that the wonderful exhibits of bird life to be seen there are all under the charge of Frank M. Chapman, one of the most noted of living ornithologists.

It was while talking with a New York man regarding the methods he adopted in procuring his specimens that Mr. Chapman showed a roll of moving pictures that contained some 6,000 views of pelicans. Then he said:

"It is very strange that here in New York the moving pictures are not shown for educational purposes as they are in London and European cities. Here they seem confined to vaudeville and the nickelodeon. I have heard lectures abroad where the most interesting microscopic pictures were exhibited in this way, the moving life of a raindrop, the flight and change of a snowflake, the life of animals and birds. I think it is time that we waked up to the possibilities of this moving picture accomplishment and adapted it to more serious uses."

There is a suggestion out of which someone might make money.

For moving pictures showing such wonders would surely be a great success provided they were beautifully presented There are thousands of people who seldom go to public entertainments because so many of them are trashy. They are fairly starving for something good. The patronage that is accorded such stereopticon lectures as those presented by Burton Holmes and Mr. Elmendorf illustrate that when the public is given something high class in this line there are plenty who will take advantage of the opportunity offered.

Think what amount of education could be gained in a city where such moving pictures as those suggested by Mr. Chapman were given each Winter! The majority of those who are eager for just such information haven't the time to gain it unaided, or if they have the time, haven't the strength. To take up a deep study of bird life after business hours is well nigh impossible for most men, and even if one did take it up he couldn't get the sort of information that would be presented to him through a series of moving pictures that show, as from the life, the habits of the birds.

And then there are the children. Have you ever seriously considered what the effect must be on them of the slap bang, vulgar sort of entertainments that are presented for them these days? No wonder that they grow up with uncouth ideas of art, with no taste in literature, with ragtime their only choice in music.

Think what it would mean to these children if charming entertainments were offered them in which they could see the real life of birds, of animals, the moving life of a rain drop, the change of a snowflake. They would be charmed, for much of light and brightness could be put into such an exhibition and 'twould prove as fascinating to them as any fairy tale that could possibly be written or staged.

Children are so pliable. Their natures are like bits of soft clay that can so easily be molded into any shape. Nourish these natures on beautiful things and what is the result? A love for beauty. Why should it not be given them in their entertainments? It could easily be done, but the impression has gone forth that these little charming creatures with their plastic natures care only for the crude, the uncouth, the vulgar.

As for the older folks, they sadly feel the need of instructing entertainments, and let that word entertainment be emphasized. They want to learn through an entertaining channel. Why doesn't some enterprising business man or circle realize this and invest in a series of entertainments of this sort? It would be a regular gold mine. I have faith enough in human nature to believe this.—Irene Gardner in the "Sun."

Toledo, Ohio.—The Empire Theater Company has been incorporated, with a capital stock of $10,000. The incorporators are Frank L. Mulholland and others.

Wilmington, Del.—The Flatiron Moving Picture Company has been incorporated with a capital stock of $30,000 for the purpose of operating moving picture theaters. The incorporators are: Charles Slunt, Harry Hecheimer, both of Baltimore, and Ralph O. Lupton, of Wilmington.

Hagerstown, Md., is to have an up-to-date moving picture parlor, which will be one of the handsomest decorated fronts in that part of the State. Seating capacity, 500 opera chairs. It will be run in connection with several other houses that are controlled by Ernest Westfall and W. D. Nydegger, of Elkins, W. Va. This beautiful house will be open April 1.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS

The following appears as an editorial in the St. Louis (Mo.) Times:

"There is a lot of wholesome amusement and instruction in the moving picture idea; but the enterprises should be safeguarded. Amateurs should be kept out of the business. A license should be demanded for the operator. Every fire precaution should be thrown about the building. There must be no locking of the stable after the horse is stolen. There is no current amusement that attracts a larger number of women and children. The moving picture has entered the church and lyceum, the public hall in the village.

"Few persons are willing to say that the novelty should be prohibited. But it should be surrounded by the protection of the law, to the end that the innocent may be saved from greedy carelessness."

In nearly every case where a film takes fire it is the fault of the operator. He is perhaps ignorant, or if not, he neglects his business. No intelligent operator will think of letting the light play upon the film for any length of time except when the film is in motion. If this precaution is taken, the light will never set the film afire.

As stated, there are or should be fire proof magazines to contain the film when it is on the machine. The filled reel is placed in the upper iron magazine and as it feeds through the machine it winds up on another iron magazine in the bottom of the machine, thus keeping the film taut and exposing only a few inches of tightly stretched film at any time. If these magazines are properly made the entire film could not burn even were it to be ignited through carelessness. There would be a small puff, a little smoke, and about two feet of film would be lost. That would be about all. But if the "lamp house" is hung with curtains, if the operator is permitted to smoke while at work, if he lets hot pieces of carbons lie about the machine, or if he lets his light play upon a motionless film five minutes at a time, there is liability of fire, and nothing else could be expected.

In a fire which took place in this city some time ago the operator is said to have admitted that he did not use a magazine; that he let his film unwind and run into a bag where it accumulated like so much celluloid shavings; and then he knocked a piece of red hot carbon on the bag! Of course, there was fire, and the lamp house was charred. But had the audience remained seated not a person would have been harmed. Just here is where the great trouble is. An audience simply wno't sit still. There is something going on that they do not understand and at the first mention or thought of a fire they are off like wild men and women and break their necks and others' as well to get away from fancied danger. As long as there are audiences in any place there will be danger from panic. The panic at Quickel's church a few weeks ago plainly demonstrated this. Let a man or woman cry "Fire!" in a crowded church, theater or any other place and there is going to be more or less trouble. Anything can cause a panic and it will probably always be so.

The only practical thing to do is to take every precaution possible as to the installation and operation of any apparatus, not only of picture machines, but anything else that is used to entertain, and then to see to it that in case of any excitement the people can get out quickly. There is no use trying to leave anything to the judgment of the audience. They simply won't use any judgment whatever. Were the people in an open field and a sudden excitement take place, it is altogether likely that some one would get hurt, although the actual source of danger be many feet from them. If they did nothing else, they would crush a few dozen to death by jumping and piling on top of them in their frenzy to get away.

There are hundreds of things that are just as dangerous as a moving picture machine; but somehow the machines have happened to be where disaster stalked, and in the public mind these machines had to bear the brunt of the whole matter. But the moving pictures have come to stay. The people like them. It is a cheap form of amusement, and is as attractive as it is cheap, and they will attend the entertainments just as they did before the Boyertown disaster, and the patronage will increase. It has always been so, and no doubt will always be so. The [illegible] can only see to it that every precaution is taken to provide as much safety as possible and let it got at that.—York [illegible]

THE MOVING PICTURE OUTLOOK IN AMERICA.

Important Interview with Ingvald C. Oes.

The Great Northern Film Company occupies the unique position of being the one great importing film house, which through recent changes, combinations and affiliations, has absolutely preserved its independence. It has gone neither with the Patents Company nor with the Independents, either in New York or in Chicago. We were rather anxious, in the interest of our readers, to ascertain from Mr. Oes, himself, how recent changes had affected the business of the New York branch of the company.

"The answer to your question," said Mr. Oes, "can be best judged from the fact that we are constantly receiving repeat orders for our films, and that I am daily cabling to Europe for fresh shipments. We are perfectly well satisfied with the position of affairs, and we consider the outlook most promising."

We took occasion to compliment Mr. Oes upon the beautiful quality of the bi-colored film of the Copenhagen Zoo, which was recently shown us, and which has proved such a pronounced success through the country.

"Of course," said Mr. Oes, "we are very pleased with this experiment, and so it seems are the exhibitors, for we are constantly in receipt of further orders for this film. It is all in favor of this process of coloring the picture that there is no additional charge for the film. It would not be fair to us, of course, for you to expect us to disclose the details of the process. So far, of course, it has been experimental, but the results of that experiment justify us in the belief that there is a future for this method of coloring film."

Duping seems to be rife in the moving picture trade and Mr. Oes is busy in accumulating evidence which will enable him, in connection with others, to suppress this nefarious practise. Suspicion points to more than one malefactor in the Eastern States. It is asserted that licensed film is duped almost immediately on issue and that it is offered to the exchanges over the telephone at 8 cents per foot. Legal evidence, however, of what is being done is difficult to obtain, but we gather from Mr. Oes that he and others are determined to suppress this form of dishonesty.

A further point that engaged attention in this interview was that some renters handled both licensed and Independent films; another was that many of the licensed exchanges are by no means keeping to the letter of their agreement with the Patents Company. Indeed, it appears that the general situation in the opinion of Mr. Oes, and as we have gathered from others in the moving picture field, is just about as confused as it was before the formation of the Patents Company, and the virtual suppression of the Film Service Association.

This led up to an expression of opinion by Mr. Oes, that the article recently published in our pages advocating the formation of a new film service association had attracted widespread attention, and that the suggestions we therein made had been well received throughout the moving picture industry. It is Mr. Oes' opinion that the need of a film service association for protecting the proper interests of the manufacturers, renters and exhibitors and generally looking after the well being of the moving picture industry was greater than ever. Responsibility for taking action in the matter, however, rests with the leading exchanges who are primarily concerned in it. It was Mr. Oes' opinion that such men as Swanson, Laemmle and others who were at the head of the old Film Service Association, should take the initiative in forming a new one.

We think the optimistic opinions on the outlook of Mr. Oes and on the present position and future prospects of the moving picture deserving of the very greatest weight. The Great Northern film has manifested an increasing popularity wherever shown in America, a fact which, we think, disposes of any possible objection to imported films for American audiences. Evidently Great Northern films fill the bill, and that being the case some recent attacks on the imported product that have been printed lose their point.

Finally it was Mr. Oes' opinion that the Moving Picture World should take the initiative in constituting a new film service association. "Your article," said Mr. Oes, "was timely and well received, and as everybody reads the Moving Picture World, I believe that your suggestion will be acted upon if you ventilate the matter further."

We thank Mr. Oes for the unsolicited compliment paid to this journal, and thus bring to a close a very agreeable interview with one of the most popular and respected figures in the moving picture industry to-day.

USING OLD FILMS.

As has been pointed out previously, managers are using old films, or those which were released some time ago, since the output of new subjects has been restricted, and in doing this they are following a sensible course. However, there should be some distinction made. No manager ought to reproduce the films he has previously used in his theater. There are subjects enough to go around without that necessity.

In one New York theater the past week "The One Best Bet" and "A Plucky Young Woman" have been seen. Both have appeared in the same theater before. This would seem to be poor policy, though the audience seemed interested.

It is not the use of old films that is criticised. It is using old films in the same theater. That is the thing that should not be practiced. Get old ones, if you need them to complete your programs, but get those which you have never used before.

Toledo, Ohio.—The Family Theater, formerly the Princess (vaudeville and pictures), has closed, owing to poor business. It is reported around town that bad business management was the real reason of the collapse. Abe Shapiro has severed his connection with the Superior Film Supply House and is now manager for Louis Less.

Charleston, W. Va.—The New Casino, managed by Ely, Weston & Co., has undergone many changes of late and the management now claim it to be the safest picture theater in the Shenandoah Valley. High-class pictures, the latest songs and music by an orchestra constitute the programme.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

Great minds think alike. I. W. Ullmann wants to abolish vaudeville from moving picture houses. So do I. He is for its exclusion on general grounds. I on particular. He argues that by eliminating vaudeville from the larger houses the little man is saved from unfair competition. I don't care a hang for either big or little men in this game. I object to vaudeville in any size, shape or form in a moving picture house. It is out of place. The audiences don't want it. They say so every time in the most unmistakable fashion whenever I find myself in a moving picture house. They don't tell me so in so many words; but they behave as if they would rather do without it. In fact, they look upon vaudeville turns as fillers.

Besides, what do people go to moving picture houses for? The pictures. Then why not give them pictures—good pictures and plenty of them? The vaudeville acts as such are seldom worth listening to or looking at. You would not find them at the regular houses devoted to this kind of entertainment. They are not good enough. They are reserved for the moving picture dog. Some foolish persons who conduct moving picture theaters persuade themselves that anything is good enough for that unfortunate animal. Never was there a greater fallacy. He is a far more intelligent beast than is commonly supposed. He is being educated up to discriminating between the good, the bad and the indifferent. He is a factor to be reckoned with in the situation.

The association of vaudeville with moving pictures is a confession of weakness. To my mind it proves that the M. P. man doesn't know what a good thing he has in the pictures, and so he gives 'em away with a pound of tea; or rather, the pictures are the tea and the vaudeville are the gifts. Same thing. Not one man in 10,000 knows how to properly conduct a moving picture house. Few exhibitors really know. The censors don't know; nor do the manufacturers; nor do the renters. But the public knows. And the way it conveys its knowledge is by the negative plan of staying away from a show that it doesn't like. Whenever there are bad pictures, badly shown, and bad vaudeville in an unwholesome shack then the public generally stays away in its hundreds of thousands. The converse is equally true.

Vaudeville is either good or bad. In moving picture houses it is generally bad. It is only a cut above the amateur kind, which the intellectual patrons of Miner's unmercifully deride. What folly it is then to foist it off upon the patrons of moving picture houses, who do not want it, who know what is good and what is bad, and who if they want vaudeville go to those places where it is made a specialty of. Consider the adverse effect which indifferent vaudeville has upon the pictures. It depreciates them; it puts the audience in a far from flattering mood towards the pictures, which it unconsciously ranks in quality with the song and dance acts however bad these may be. See it, Mr. Exhibitor? I do.

The money that is spent on vaudeville might be more judiciously laid out in other directions. For example, in more artistic posters round the paybox. These things are, as a rule, truly awful abominations in the way of design and color printing. They are so crude that they repel rather than attract, and so they are very bad advertisements. If I ran a moving picture house I would specialize in attractive printing matter of the highest class. I would die rather than exhibit the colorific atrocities upon which reliance is at present placed to get the people in. These horrible things have a strong family likeness. Wonder who does 'em. He ought to be electrocuted. Hope he will be.

A neat, well-kept entrance, with tasteful printing, good specimen photographs, mirrors, a pretty girl in the paybox and a gentlemanly "barker"—do not these things make for success? Yea, verily; and of a truth. Then have 'em, gents, in preference to wishy washy vaudeville. Get the people in and use all legitimate means for doing so. Hang vaudeville, but furbish up the outside of the house. Advertise the pictures. Not one moving picture house in a thousand does this effectively and clearly. The untutored aboriginal from Oklahoma or Arizona striking New York for the first time, or any other large city for that matter, would be puzzled to know what is really to be seen in the average moving picture house. I can't tell at times, and I've been following the moving picture for several years.

All the signs of the times point to the uplift (lovely word "uplift"—so soothing. Isn't it?) of the moving picture. In other words it is earning, for its intrinsic good qualities, the serious consideration and respect of the intelligent public. It is good enough to stand by itself. Why handicap it by linking it to indifferent vaudeville? The latter does not dignify the moving picture any more than it would dignify grand opera or an orchestral concert at Carnegie Hall. The moving picture conceivably ranks, in the artistic sense, with either of these. The Biograph "Lady Helen's Escapade" assuredly does; and, frankly, if that pretty film, on my visit to a moving picture theater, was to be preceded by vaudeville I would not take my seat until the latter was finished. Not if I knew it.

W. H. SWANSON AND THE INDEPENDENT SERVICE.

In a circular issued to the trade W. H. Swanson makes the following remarks:

"From the policy and actions displayed by the Trust during the last six weeks you will readily see that it is their intention to secure a hold on the exhibitor by which they can compel him to pay the rental rate asked by the exchange, controlled by the Trust, and which it is the intention of the Trust shall be exorbitant.

"Now you may think that so long as you can secure films from Trust exchanges at a reasonable rate you will continue to do so, but do you not realize that by giving them this patronage you are not only furnishing them with the funds with which they are later going to fight you, but you are also acknowledging the right of the Trust to demand your complying with the conditions they are at present attempting to force upon you, such as the $2 a week royalty? Has the Trust any right to demand from you a royalty on a machine that you have already paid your good money for? When you bought your machine did you purchase it with any idea that in the future such a condition was to be imposed? If this had been the case the Trust might then have some right to this royalty, but under the present state of affairs it is a hold-up in every sense of the word.

Royalty Not Reduced.

"Another thing, if you will stop and think for a moment you will remember that there was some kind of a vague promise that this royalty was to be reduced to the smaller theaters in the country towns after March 8, but was it done?

"We believe that every American citizen has instilled in him that love of freedom and independence which is so dear to us, and which our forefathers fought for, and is with us in our fight against this despotic combination of manufacturers, and we shall at all times use our utmost endeavors to please our customers in the future, as in the past.

"The Independent service which we will furnish is of much higher quality both photographically and in subject matter than that being furnished by the exchanges representing the Trust.

"The films that will be placed in our rental stock will be the cream of the Independent productions and will be selected by Mr. Swanson personally and his selection will be based on the character, action and photographic detail and perfection. Not alone will we be able to furnish you a higher class service but we will also be able to offer you a greater variety of subjects from which you may make your selections.

Large Repair Department.

"Fully realizing the great importance of the condition of the film when received by our patrons, we maintain a large repair and inspection department employing 24 persons. Each film before sending out is carefully inspected so that there will be no chance of patches breaking while operating and so that the sprocket holes will be in good condition; and the film is again inspected when returned and we immediately cut off any customer who damages our films, in order to keep them in the best of condition.

"Our subjects all have long titles and each month they are put through a cleaning and renewing process which removes every streak of 'rain' and makes the picture stand out clear and well defined on the curtain; in fact, we furnish a perfect service in every respect."

WEEKLY COMMENTS ON THE SHOWS.

By Our Own Critic.

The uplift of the moving picture of which we have heard and read so much of late, would soon be an accomplished fact if all the theaters at which these pictures are shown were so well conducted as those under the control of Keith & Proctor. Time after time we have paid tribute to the excellent manner in which the Keith & Proctor houses in this city are administered, and on the occasion of our visit this week to the Bijou Dream, on Twenty-third street, we were more than ever convinced that if the Keith & Proctor methods were more general in the moving picture field the public would respond so generously to the efforts made on its behalf that there would be no longer any doubt as to its attitude towards this form of entertainment; in short, the moving picture would be at its apotheosis.

At the Twenty-third street house everything is done to give the moving picture its finest possible setting. The theater itself is a beautiful place, always well swept and garnished. The entrance is neat, well cared for and attractive; the attendants the very pink of courtesy and good manners. You are shown to your seat with as much politeness as if you had disbursed $10 instead of only as many cents. And then how warm and cosy the interior of this pretty place is! You sit at your ease among nice well-mannered people and you are able to study the pictures in the very best possible environment, an environment of intelligence and luxury which materially accentuates your enjoyment of what is shown you on the silent stage.

The pianist at the Keith & Proctor Twenty-third street house is alone worth listening to. He is an accomplished performer, and on the occasion of my visit last Tuesday, I was quite charmed to note the effective manner in which he suited his music to the action of the various films that were shown. He and the man at the drum make excellent harmony, and here again the pictures gain by the suitable symphonic accompaniment that illustrates the action.

They have an excellent lecturer here with clear pronunciation, and the young lady who sings is a good singer, while the slides shown are of the best. Such a programme as I saw was varied and, of course, up-to-date, and constituted a bill so rich and varied that it quite satisfied my appetite without the assistance of vaudeville. For example, amusing comedy found expression in the Biograph subjects, "Lucky Jim" and "Twin Brothers"; then we had the whimsical Lubin, "Inventions of an Idiot"; while of drama there was the same manufacturer's "Why the Mail Was Late," the Pathe beautifully colored "Gold Prospectors," "The Clever Reporter," and the same manufacturer's tragic "Dynamiters" and "Acrobatic Skaters." The programme covered all phases of stage representation: the laughable, comedy and drama, the tragic, the eccentric and the scenic. Nothing here of the educational or preaching! Keith & Proctor audiences do not want this. The house was well filled on Tuesday afternoon with people who, like myself, were snatching a brief half hour from the ordinary cares of this work-a-day world. I think they felt as I did; namely, they were having a little mental change and rest. They found no difficulty in following the clearly depicted incidents on the silent stage. No enigmas or problems were presented to them. There was nothing depressing or murderous in the programme; all was lightness, brightness and healthy excitement; in fact, the mind was stimulated instead of being depressed. The bright side of life was shown, with here and there a touch of sentiment, and the consequence was that we came out of this theater feeling all the better for what we had seen.

Now this is the kind of impression which we think best calculated to promote the uplift of the moving picture. Keith & Proctor are manifestly working to that end. Their efforts are only to be known to be sure of widespread encouragement. There should be room in New York and other great cities for many theaters like the Twenty-third street house—theaters which attract the better classes of the public, where we can see the acting and photographic arts illustrated in their highest development, and, above all, where we can take women and children in the certainty that nothing will be shown them which will cause them the least offense.

Keith & Proctor, I take off my hat to you for presenting the moving picture to the public in its best possible aspect, and I commend your excellent example to the thousands of other exhibitors throughout the country who want an object lesson in giving the public the best that the moving picture field has to offer.

Notable Films of the Week.

Little Shepherd of Tumbling Run (Edison).

If the Edison Company in this film have not quite got the "scent of the hay across the footlights," they have at least set us down by the babbling brook and the green fields, for in it we have a subject for which the author might have gone to the pages of Thomas Hardy or any other novelist who belongs to the naturalistic school of writers, that is, those who take Nature herself, away from the popular cities and the busy haunts of man, for their subject. On the ground alone that it is a welcome variation of subject we think that this Edison film is a great advance on recent productions, and so, we think, did our companions in the theater the other day when we sat and followed the course of the story. Let our readers understand that in writing these comments or criticisms we are not giving a purely personal opinion, but we have set ourselves the task of assimilating the opinion of typical audiences in a high-class New York moving picture theater. What we think they think; what we say they say, and so it follows that the opinions of the Moving Picture World on current film subjects may be taken as embodying the sense of the public.

"The Little Shepherd of Tumbling Run" gives us a glimpse of farm life in some of its most pleasing aspects. The tending of a flock of sheep is entrusted to a little boy who unfortunately loses one of the lambs. The little fellow's distress when he returns to his mother's cottage to bewail his loss is affecting to see; but worse follows, for he is accused by the owner of the flock of stealing the lamb. So in the night he sets forth to search for the lamb and meets with an accident as he finds the object of his search. Traced by his faithful dog, the boy is rescued by his mother and taken back to the cottage. The guilt being removed, the owner of the lamb relents and presents the lamb to the boy, who fondles it for awhile but decides that it will be happier with its mother.

Now this is a charming little pastoral idyll and we think that the Edison Company in working it out have shown great skill, for it is not an easy subject to handle. Consider first of all the driving of the sheep by the farm hands. This, in itself, is a difficult subject to photograph. Then we have the scene of the lost sheep on the rocks, the accident to the little shepherd in his haste to reach it, the climbing and descent, and finally the reunion of the sheep and lamb, not to mention the peregrinations of the faithful dog who plays a very pleasing part in the story. A difficult subject well handled and a pleasing story well told, it is a film that goes a long way in establishing the very broad claim that has been made by the press agent that the products of the licensed manufacturers are "moral, educational and cleanly amusing—the highest type of film production of the world."

Photographically speaking, the film is full of variety. Much skill is shown in toning the cottage interiors in which some of the action of the film takes place, also the moonlight views on the hillside. One defect is conspicuous in the film, which we think could be eliminated in the developing room, and that is the number of troublesome small opaque spots which are probably chemical defects.

The reception of "The Little Shepherd of Tumbling Run" wherever it has been shown in New York this week has been remarkably favorable. When we saw it, it was sandwiched in between two funnyosities, and its appearance came as a positive relief. Not merely the Edison Company, but other manufacturers are to be encouraged in cultivating the poetical vein, if we may so term it, in the preparation of films. If this is an experiment then it is a very successful one. More of the same sort, Messrs. Edison.

Wilbur Wright's Aeroplane (Pathe).

Not so very many years ago life motion pictures were not dreamed of, far less the conquest of the air by man. When we read the modest announcement by the manufacturers of this film we expected to see some very good photographs of aerial navigation experiments. We did, but we never expected to see so vivid a representation of so marvelous an event. Words fail to describe the sensation of seeing a man seated on a bird-like thing of sticks and canvas mount gracefully into the air, circle around and around, arise and descend, always under perfect control and with apparent ease and safety. Notwithstanding the fact that the famous film of the Italian Cavalry Riders is also one of this week's releases, we do not hesitate to say that in our opinion the Wright Brothers' Aeroplane is the most remarkable and most interesting, if not the most thrilling film that we have ever seen or could wish to see. Two sciences, yet in their infancy, cinematography and aeronautics, here unite to startle the eyes of the world with events which are only forerunners of their future twin achievements. There are few who are not interested in aeronautics; there are still fewer Americans who are not proud that the highest honors for results accomplished fall to American-born young men. Two weeks ago we advised exhibitors to bill this subject as a feature. We repeat the advice and also suggest that they advertise it in their local newspapers, so that it will draw to the shows a class of people who are not regular frequenters. Pathe's photographer has done himself credit in handling a difficult subject to perfection. The camera has been swung up and down and around its axis to keep the swiftly flying monster of the air always in the field of view. Now skimming close to the surface of the earth, like a seagull over the waves, now 700 feet in the air like an eagle, it soars over the three captive balloons, then swoops down, growing larger and larger to the eye, till it circles the field again and finally alights as gracefully as a bird. The world is indeed indebted to the Messrs. Pathe for the excellent film they have made of so difficult and rare a subject.

"His First Girl" (Vitagraph).

The Vitagraph Company this week have put out a film which appeals to all degrees, ages and temperaments of moving picture audiences. It is the ever fresh subject of a boy's first girl. This is an amusing piece of juvenile comedy, exceedingly well acted. All the world loves a lover, and we all love that boy, who, having met a nice girl, gets himself up in his best shape, preparatory to calling on the dear little thing. She receives him—nicely, of course—but alas, she is fickle and the boy has a rival. Lover number one parts with his last quarter to Julia's little brother, and has to walk home three miles for his gallantry. We do not know how this little playlet ends, but our sympathies are with the boy who parted with his quarter, and we think his girl is an intolerable flirt. However, she looks very nice in the picture, and we have hopes that she will probably reward the nice boy who suffered so much on her account.

This Vitagraph film is a very nice piece of photography and stage work, and it is conceived in that fresh and harmless vein which makes for popularity.

There was no lack of good comedy in the week's programmes. "Lucky Jim" gave the Biograph actors a chance to display their clever and convincing work. The Lubin Mfg. Co. produced "Inventions of an Idiot," a film with many clever ideas which kept the audience in good humor. Pathe's "Love-Sick Barber" provoked plenty of laughter. "How They Propose," a comedy subject by Gaumont, released by George Kleine on the 27th of April, is a humorous film in a distinctly original vein, which has caught the fancy of New York audiences this week. The film illustrates an ever popular subject, namely, "How Man Proposes Marriage to Woman," and as the various forms of proposal are conceived in the vein of broad farce, it has aroused much amusement. It is distinctly original in conception and treatment. We see love in the kitchen, in the stage coach, and most amusing of all, in the gallery of a theater. Another Gaumont-Kleine subject equally amusing is "Before and After," which shows lovely woman in her most engaging aspect before marriage, and as a lazy novel reader after, and her poor hubby doing the housework. Both subjects are sure to be popular.

The drama was well supported by "An Unwritten Letter," a most touching story and exceedingly well told by Gaumont. The story hinges on filial affection which is beautifully shown, first by a grandson and later by his mother and father. The young man escorts his grandmother to church and is afterwards jibed by his companions. One makes fun of him as leading an old lady and praying and the young man loses his temper and slaps the face of his tormentor. This means a duel, in which the young man is killed, but the Gaumont people have wisely refrained from showing the duel. The grief of the father and mother when told of the death of the son is well acted and also the little plot by which they try to keep the blind grandmother in ignorance of the tragedy. She wonders why her grandson does not write to her, believing that he is on a journey, and a dummy letter of blank paper is mailed to her and read by the boy's mother. The grandmother kisses the letter and the parents cannot restrain their tears. A second letter arrives but as no one is present the old lady asks the gardener to read it for her. Not being in the secret, he explains that it is a sheet of blank paper. This leads to an affecting disclosure. All the scenes are well acted amid fine scenery.

Comments on Film Subjects.

"The Automatic Monkey."—A Gaumont comedy which represents a toy monkey as a painter, as a sculptor, as a musician. The actions of the beast are amusing and the film gets many a laugh before it closes. It is a clean sort of comedy and should appeal to everyone. Managers can scarcely do better than to include this in their programs for at least one week.

"Before and After."—A Gaumont comedy which represents what happened to a young man before and after marriage. Before the girl was so insistent upon taking care of his clothes and keeping everything clean that he became disgusted and left her, but returned. Six months after marriage he was doing all the cleaning of his own clothes and hers as well.

"How They Propose."—A Gaumont comedy purporting to represent how men propose, or are proposed to, beginning with a proposal described in a novel and running through a considerable gamut. The pictures are comic enough to get numerous hearty laughs, but the humor in some instances is of a rather far-fetched variety.

"Hungary."—A Pathe record film, illustrating some of the interesting manners and customs of Hungary, including wedding festivities, the Sunday going to church and the pastimes of Sunday afternoon, with various other features of interest to those unfamiliar with the country and its people. As an educational picture it is especially good.

"Martyrdom of Louis XVII."—A Pathe historic film which has all the elements of the interesting and instructive films of this type which the Pathes have brought out, illustrating important epoch-making events in French history. This film shows first the royal family as it was before the Revolution disturbed its serenity. Then come the mob scenes, which are reproduced with fidelity as to costume and general appearance and action, the flight of the royal family, their imprisonment, the leading of the king away to execution, with the harrowing scenes incident to the parting from his family, the turning over of the heir presumptive to Simon, the cobbler, his abuse while there, his incarceration in a dungeon, where he was partially eaten by rats, and his death. The execution of the king is shown, and in these two scenes lie the only faults with the picture. The attempted apotheosis of the prince, the movement of the guillotine and the exhibition of the severed head should be left out of the film. One of these events is imaginary. The other can be made imaginary quite as well as to reproduce it in such a bald manner. The picture throughout is artistic and holds the unflagging interest of the audience, but unquestionably very many do not understand it. They look upon it merely as a good picture, with plenty of exciting action, but they do not realize the meaning of the drama and the consequences which flowed from its original presentation.

"Lucky Jim."—A Biograph comedy, presented with all the snap and go which characterize the efforts of the capable actors employed by that company. A girl has two lovers and Jim, as is represented in the well-remembered poem, gets her. As soon as they are married she begins to order him around, with clubs and other pleasant things in a way that makes him tired of life. Meanwhile Jack, who also wanted her, is mourning over her picture and envying Jim his good fortune. Jim suddenly dies of acute indigestion, in which perhaps there is a hidden insinuation at the average bride's ability to prepare the cuisine. Jack immediately gets busy and before very long leads the dashing young widow to the altar. The next morning his troubles begin. He complains of the coffee and the larger part of the crockery on the table is broken over his head before the widow is finished with his discipline. She leaves him in a towering rage. Slowly and with great evidence of grief he crawls from under the table, takes Jim's picture from the wall and repeats with every indication of sadness those well-known lines:

"Lucky Jim,
How I envy him."

"The Twin Brothers."—A Biograph comedy which has little point, but is, on the whole, fairly entertaining and leaves no bad impression.

"Inventions of an Idiot."—A Lubin film in which all sorts of queer things are done with so-called inventions, including a flight through the clouds in an automobile with wings, and similar absurd and semi-surgical features. The picture is entertaining in this degree alone. It is not particularly startling in its development of the magical features, but it serves to amuse, and that, after all, is more the province of the motion picture than instruction, or any other ponderous reason.

"Why the Mail Was Late."—A Western melodrama from Lubin which has all the snap and go for which these pictures have become known. The action is remarkably spirited and the scenery is sufficiently accurate to be pleasing. The riding of the cowboys is too long, but inasmuch as it is lively that can be overlooked. As a whole it is a good picture of its kind.

"The Belated Meal."—A Vitagraph subject which has many comedy elements well worked out. A gentleman starts out to purchase a dinner for the house, but falls in with companions by the way and enters one place after another until he has to be assisted home by the police, while dinner is many hours late, as shown by the clock. The comedy is rather broad, but the picture gets the laughs, and that is its intention.

"His First Girl."—A Vitagraph film which reproduces life. Every man who has been through the blissful experience of the first girl will look upon this picture as a reproduction of that time in his own life. It will undoubtedly be extremely popular.

"The Little Shepherd of Tumbling Run."—An Edison film which reaches in places the sublime. It cannot be too highly commended. The photographic tones are unquestionably accurate and the efforts of the manufacturers to produce a film of this quality should be recognized. While this is an excellent picture and the story is remarkably well told, there are some defects that should be pointed out, for, in a degree, they mar the beauty of the work. The worst fault is that farmers in this country do not dress like those shown in this picture, and clearly the scenery is not foreign. To make the picture harmonious the scenery and the costuming should correspond. Technically the film could scarcely be improved. The tones and lighting are exceptionally good and the night lighting is produced without the harshness which is common in most night pictures. But the rest of the picture should be worked out to correspond. Then, indeed, there would be nothing to mar it as a finished production.

"All for a Bird."—A Pathe comedy which carries the smashing things in a house about to the limit. A gentleman and lady purchase a pigeon and have it sent home. The bird escapes after the messenger gets it in the house and the messenger and the butler start to catch it. The effects of their tearing through the house after the escaped bird are very disastrous. Sometimes the complications into which they tumble are funny, but it doesn't look just right to have everything within reach destroyed for the sake of creating a little fun.

"A Blind Woman's Story."—A Pathe film which has its pathetic side. A blind woman sits for an artist to make a picture. He pays her liberally and she takes her money home, where her bad son takes it from her and gambles it away. He also takes the dog which leads her about and gambles him away, but the dog escapes and returns to his mistress. In going about in a rough path the woman falls from a precipice. The dog immediately runs to the home of the artist and makes him know that something wrong has occurred. The artist rushes out to find the woman over the cliff. He rallies assistance and she is taken up not badly hurt. She tells him the story and he takes her home to live with him. It is a simple enough story, and its chief attraction lies in its ending, which shows the woman and her dog cared for and made comfortable. In this the picture is better than some which are rather disposed to leave the person they are depicting in trouble.

"Compassion."—An Eclair which has elements of great dramatic strength which are utilized to good advantage by the capable actors the company keeps. A clergyman befriends a tramp after he has been turned away by the housekeeper. The tramp afterward meets the sister of the clergyman by the roadside and in a struggle for possession of her purse or some trinket injures her so that she dies. The tramp later invades a farmer's property and is shot so that he feels himself mortally wounded. He rushes to the clergyman and makes confession, telling the story of the killing of the young woman. The clergyman recoils in horror, but when the officers arrive to arrest the tramp for the attempted robbery he refuses to give him up. The tramp later dies in great agony, but before he dies receives full pardon from the clergyman. The interest is heightened by the struggle which goes on in the clergyman's mind as he is deciding whether to give up the wounded man or not. As he struggles the figure of Christ appears to him and exhorts him to have compassion. The picture is admirable in many respects. The facial expressions of the actors as they perform their parts are extremely good and the entire film seems natural, not impossible as some do.

"The Anarchist's Sweetheart."—An anarchist, in this Hepworth film, draws the fatal lot which determines that he shall throw the bomb to kill a high official of his government. He tells his sweetheart of it, and she begs him not to do it, pointing out the danger which threatens him if he does. But he goes on and secretes himself in some bushes by the roadside where the official must pass. Here he is discovered by the officers and captured, but escapes and runs home, hiding in the stable. He secures a dummy and places it on horseback, sending it careering over the fields, the officers in hot pursuit. While he is preparing the dummy the officers are trying to extort from the girl a confession of the whereabouts of the man, but she refuses and the knout is applied very vigorously. After the officers have started away after the dummy, the young man rushes back to the house, picks up the insensible girl, mounts a horse and then disappears, leaving the inference that they escaped safely. The most interesting feature is the clever ruse by which the dummy is placed on a horse to represent the escaped man. The torture of the girl is not pleasant, being too true to life for one to care to see it more than once.

"A Thoughtless Beauty."—A Hepworth film in which a young Scotch beauty is represented as having two lovers. The three are standing on the brink of a steep bank. To test their love she challenges them to go down the bank after her handkerchief, which she tosses away. One starts down, but misses his footing and falls. The acting as help is summoned and a rescuer is lowered by means of a rope is good. Finally the young man is drawn up and taken to the house. She follows, but is denied admission by his father and when she attempts to force her way in is soundly caned by the irate old gentleman. The mother allows her to enter and the picture closes with a very contrite little woman in a very strong lover's arms. The photography of this film is remarkably good and the scenery represented is far above the average. The tone qualities are among the best seen in many a day.

'The Last Days of Pompeii."—Too high praise cannot be bestowed upon this film from the Raleigh & Roberts studio. It is a model which could well be followed by everyone who is in any way interested in the manufacture of films. It is the well-known story of the love of Claucus for Ione, the love of Nydia, the blind girl, for Claucus, the perfidy of Arbaces, the eruption of Vesuvius, the guiding of Claucus and Ione through the darkness by Nydia and their escape on a galley, while Nydia plunges into the ocean to her death. It is unnecessary to go into the details of the story. It is well known, but one must speak of the beautiful staging, the costuming, the scenery and the accessories. They couldn't be better and should please the student of ancient Greek literature and life as well as those who look at it merely as a picture without reference to what it means. The eruption of Vesuvius is so well managed that it seems almost as though it were actually in progress, while the fall of buildings and the flight of the terrified people through the ruins is wonderfully realistic, and in the last scene as the galley bearing Claucus and Ione sails away the reflection of the flames is clearly shown on the water, but the flames themselves are not in sight. The effect is extremely artistic. This film is commended to any manager as a strong addition to his program.

"The Squire and the Noble Lord."—An Eclipse which doesn't seem entirely clear. A young man is eivdently in love with a girl. A lord comes down the street with his retinue, and on each side the populace pay him obeisance. He sees the girl and steps aside to make love to her, attempting to take her in his arms, but her lover intervenes and thrusts the lord away. He has the young man arrested and sends him to the chateau. The girl goes to plead with the lord for her lover's release, but the lord insists upon familiarities and has the young man brought out to witness them. The girl still refuses to submit, and the lord says he will have the young man thrown over the parapet unless she does, then she permits him, but before he has accomplished what he intended the young man breaks away from his jailers and throws the lord over. The two lovers escape together. This film is unsatisfactory and might better be censored. If it is based upon the old feudal custom that any young woman on a lord's domain was his if he wished, then it has some point, but even then the story is not pleasant, neither is it wholesome, and should be suppressed.

Dear Sir:

I am writing in reference to the "HALLBERG" Economizer on alternating current, and will say since the installation of your machines the results have been very gratifying. A much better light is obtained, and a great saving in current, a wonderful improvement over the old rheostat system.

"The Lost Sheep."—A Vitagraph film in which the story is told of a girl who goes astray in the usual way through being attracted by the blandishments of a young man, tricked into a mock marriage and then abandoned. She finds her way home to her mother and her lover and is taken back by them. It has a moral teaching which is not without its value, but the picture, as a whole, is depressing in its influence, and the technical quality is not up to the standard of the Vitagraph in all scenes.

"A Faithful Fool."—A Vitagraph subject in which a court fool informs a lover that the girl he loves has been stolen by a rival whom her father favors. He and the fool follow the captors and overtake them in a wood. In the sword duel which follows all the brigands are killed and the fool receives his death wound, dying after the lovers are reunited. The acting is good, the staging could scarcely be better, but the story itself contains too much of gloom to be amusing and too little fresh dramatic interest to be particularly attractive.

"The Suspicious Fencing Master" is certainly not up to the standard of the rooster trade mark. The subject is weak, not to say insignificant. The Pathe Freres show us, generally, better acting and better photography.

"The Fairy's Presents."—A short trick film of the Pathe Freres which is well worked and rather amusing, well colored and offering some fine scenic effects. At the death of her father, a young girl is thrown out by her greedy brothers. She meets a fairy and her first act is to make her bad brothers share her good luck, but when they find themselves in front of a table loaded with edibles, they chase away the sister. She returns with a second gift. This time it is gold, and as the bad brothers want the whole of it, they once more throw away their sister, but they are punished by an explosion. The fairy then appears, turns the bad brothers into pigs, while the young girl is made a princess.

"Old Heidelberg."—An Essanay production that is a departure from their usual line of work. To Americans it is an interesting and satirical representation of the customs of the German court, but we imagine that if it had been produced in the land of the Kaiser the producer would have been haled up for lese majesté. Fairly well acted it called for favorable comments from the audience, but the representation of the famous Heidelberg University and the lack of court etiquette provoked comments from some Germans who were in the audience. The photography is good and remarkably steady. A lack of detail in the faces and white dresses is a defect which was noticed in this and also other films shown during the week. It is to be hoped that the articles on technique which are now appearing in The World will stir up manufacturers to give stricter attention to that important element of good photography, viz., sufficient exposure of the negative to bring out the detail without having to force the development and thus block the high lights and lose the delicate half tones.

"Love Under Spanish Skies," a full reel subject from Selig, has been generally commended this week as a piece of magnificent stagecraft, and the story is told in a more connected manner and more vividly than in most subjects of this character. It is well received and a film that one would like to see more than once.

ONE ROOSEVELT HUNT FAILS.

Col. Roosevelt hunted in the jungle of the cedars out on the marshes to the eastward of Sheepshead Bay village one day last week. He hunted before the eyes of a moving picture machine, and it would have been a perfectly bully hunt had it not been that the hind legs of the elephant caved in at the crucial moment and had not a grass fire maliciously set by some of the undesirable citizens of Sheepshead Bay destroyed the jungle utterly.

The hunter had no warning, positively none, of either catastrophe. The hind legs of the elephant had been earning their little $3 a day right up to the minute when the art director of the company cried "Shoot!" and then they stepped in a hole and threw the rear elevation of the elephant entirely out of plumb. As to the fire, it was a dastardly, cowardly attempt at reprisal and maybe it can be ignored.

One of Wildest Parts of Jungle.

It was about 10 o'clock when the automobiles carrying the hunting party and a moving picture camera whisked through Sheepshead Bay and out Voorhees avenue to the cedar swamp on the other side of Clam Creek. The elephant, the lion, the camp equipment, and all the African entourage followed more sloly in wagons and on foot. The rendezvous is one of the wildest parts of the jungle this side of Plum Island.

Once at the rendezvous, Col. Roosevelt and the art director were all activity. The colonel of to-day, who gave up a good place as leading man in the "A Gambler of the West" company out in Altoona, Pa., to come to Sheepshead Bay, retired behind a clump of bushes and got into his khaki and Rough Rider hat with expedition. He also put on his mustache and fitted in his extra set of flashing teeth. Then the handkerchief he knotted about his neck made a true semblance of the now famous photograph taken before the tent at Montauk Point.

While the colonel was adjusting his countenance and his raiment, the African entourage of jungle beasts were busy in the background prinking up for the hunt. The African entourage comprised three saloon porters of Sheepshead Bay, one blacksmith's helper, extremely muscular, of King's Highway; a roustabout from the old racetrack, and George, the well-known gin drinker of Bath Beach. All are dark enough to give the true local color to the jungle. All were stripped to the waist and there were hung about their middles yards of white cloth such as the Kroo boys are accustomed to wearing.

The jungle beasts found some difficulty with their toilettes. The lion had to stuff two pillows into his abdominal region in order that the prosperity of Africa might not be belied. Frankie, the large black gorilla, couldn't make his feet track, so he complained bitterly that his toes were not prehensile. As for the three ourang outangs and the mandril, they could not sit down once, having been buttoned up the back.

Colonel Coming Into Camp.

"Now, boys," quoth the art director after he had brought all of the hunt properties out of the wagon, "remember that the picture can't show you up any too plain; we don't want it to."

The first graphic picture was of Col. Roosevelt's hunting entrance into camp. The art director marshaled all of the African entourage back in the brush of the background and armed them. To three he gave guns, instructing them to carry the weapons loosely over their left arms. To one he gave a typewriter case—unmistakably a typewriter case—which he should carry hoisted on his unaccustomed shoulders, with the lettering, "T. R., Mombasa," held to the front. The other two carried packages of dunnage on their shoulders and wicked-looking assegais in their right hands.

With Col. Roosevelt in the fore, his teeth in the fore even of him—and the African entourage grinning and glistening, directly behind, the procession through the jungle of the cedars in the direction of the kinetograph was started.

Then the Elephant Catches Fire.

Just then came a wild cry from the mechanic behind the kinetograph:

"Hey, the elephant's on fire."

The procession halted and the art director hurried to the side of the mutely patient pachyderm standing off by the edge of the marsh. He lifted up the skin on the port side of the elephant and peered within.

"Say, do you think I pay you $3 a day to be the hind legs and then to have you go and smoke inside the elephant? Get out, or quit smoking. Don't you know this thing'll burn?"

"Well, you can't expect a fellow to stay bent over all day," came the complaint from the hind legs, "and not have a little smoke, kin you?"

The interrupted procession into the jungle began again. Col. Roosevelt, with the sun in his face, glared at the picture machine in the most lifelike manner. His African entourage merely looked and played the part.

On Scent of the Quarry.

After the bivouac the next incident that was to thrill thousands of prospective audiences was arranged. The heart of the African jungle with Col. Roosevelt on the scent of the quarry! The elephant, fore and aft, was stationed in the offing where it could casually lumber into the path of the hunter.

Col. Roosevelt started to pad softly through the jungle of the cedars, eyes and teeth alert for game. The elephant had the first cue. The mammoth of the forest stalked with undulating motion out into the delighted ken of the colonel.

"Now shoot!" came the command of the art director, and then came the shocking tragedy to the elephant's hind legs which made the poor beast crumple up before the smoke of the gun's explosion could be registered on the film.

After that in swift succession of disaster came the fire. It was with difficulty that the lion, the monkeys, and the African entourage rescued themselves and their toilets from the fast spreading blaze.

CHRONOPHONE SUBJECTS.

In our review of the Chronophone talking machine two weeks ago we stated that the Gaumont Company had in preparation a list of several hundreds of American comedies, dramas, dances, etc. A copy of a descriptive book which deals with these subjects is before us. It is the first general list of Chronophone subjects that has been issued. It covers a very large field. We note that the company employ only first class artists in the preparation of the talking or singing records. This is evidenced by the fact that Harry Lauder, Miss Victoria Monks, Signor Corradetti and others have been giving their services. In the list of subjects there are operas such as "Faust," "Carmen" and "The Mikado," then there are "Cavalleria Rusticana," as well as "The Barber of Seville." The list runs to over two hundred subjects, and we are impressed by its remarkable variety. Here are the cake-walk, whistling solos, recitations, dances, ballads, dramatic sketches, and, in fact, every kind of subject likely to amuse a popular audience, with whom these talking and singing subjects are in favor.

Then again a wise choice has been exercised in the selection of the subjects. They are bright, lively and catchy, and above all things, clean. We think that this excellent list should go far towards popularizing the Chronophone, and we recommend all those of our readers interested in a very ingenious invention to write to the Gaumont Chronophone Company, of 124 East Twenty-fifth street, New York City, for a copy of the list. It should do much towards popularizing the Chronophone in the moving picture theaters of the United States. We have repeatedly said in these pages that the future of moving picture photography is bound up with the phonograph as an adjunct, and the progress which Gaumonts are making in their work more than confirms us in our prediction.

Among the Lantern Slide Makers

Attention of the Moving Picture Patents Company is called to the fact that more than one of its licensees is addicted to the habit of using pirated and copied slides. These film exchanges are the ones that encourage the establishments that duplicate and copy the lantern slides of reputable makers who have been to great expense to get out the original negatives. The thieves sell their slides, which are copied from original colored slides and are vile in their photographic quality and coloring, for from $2.50 to $3.50 per set, often less, and some of the most prominent film exchanges encourage them in the crime and buy their output. One slide establishment advertises over four hundred sets of slides, every one so far investigated being copies. The Moving Picture Patents Company would do well to notify its licensees that punishment would be dealt out to any one of them caught using duplicated or copied slides. But that wouldn't be consistent when the crime can be traced so near home.

There is no telling what is going to happen to the lantern slide trade in the near future. With the exception of a few firms in this city complaints are made to the Woman's Protective Union that wages are not being paid. No wonder certain firms can sell slides for less than it costs to produce them when they give checks on banks where they have no deposit for their colorists' wages and run in debt for their photographic material. But all things come to an end and these cheap and crooked slide establishments are nearing their end; but in the meantime they have struck the industry a mortal blow, as the buyers of slides, generally ignorant of what distinguishes good work from bad, have got an idea that the standard firms should be made to conform to the prices quoted by the crooks. Some of the letters which the reputable slide makers of this city have received from prospective customers are marvels of insolence.

A purchaser of lantern slides writes the following letter to a New York firm who had sold him "straight goods":

"Left you because the following firm offered me slides for $2.50 per set. (Here he gives the name of one song slide bureau and another a firm of slide makers). When I got the goods from the song slide bureau I found slides from four different sets faked in to fill up the set, and out of the twelve sets I bought there was not one but had been faked, while all of them had either the title slide or chorus cracked. The firm which made slides sent me pictures copied from half-tone pictures cut from Harper's Weekly, Frank Leslie's and the magazines which when thrown on the screen looked as if they had been sprinkled with sand. One set in particular which I bought from the slide rental bureau had slides made by the Chicago Transparency Company, DeWitt C. Wheeler, Harstn and Calehuff mixed in. The scoundrel who sold them to me had not even the enterprise to change the mats. I could have done better by using the junk on my own shelves. If you can meet these people's prices I will resume getting slides from you."

Now what do you think of that? This man admits that he was grossly swindled but holds out the bait to a man who had dealt fairly by him that if he would meet the swindlers' prices he would give him his custom again. The moving picture business is full of just such men. They bite at a bait of prices to buy goods for less than they can be made for and then after being stung write to the dealers in "straight" goods that if they will meet the prices of the people who "stung" them they will buy from them again.

DeWitt C. Wheeler, the slide maker, illustrates two new songs every week for the music publishing firm of J. H. Remick & Co. This is the explanation of why more of Remick's songs are sung than any other publisher's.

Buffalo, N. Y.—The United Amusement Company has leased the melodrama house on Main street and will convert it into a moving picture house.

Bonham, Tex.—The contract has been let by the Crescent Amusement Company for the erection of an airdome to be used during this coming Summer.

CORRESPONDENCE.

EXHIBITORS JOIN IN THE "UPLIFT."

Pinconning, Mich., April 24, 1909.

Editor The Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—In a recent issue of M. P. W. an exhibitor complains that some of the films treat of subjects not simple enough for the understanding of the patrons, and he mentions "Mary Stuart," "Virginius," "Charlotte Corday." These subjects please the majority of our patrons because we explain them, and that is the only way to elevate the moving picture business and the taste of our patrons, not only in moving pictures but in reading. Let us have ancient, medieval and modern history films, but let us have them true to history, not like a recent film, "For Love of Country," which no censor should allow to be shown, not only on account of its false history teaching but of the horror of the Indians burning out the soldier's eyes. That disgusted our patrons. Let us have more of Shakespeare's dramas, of Sheridan's, Goldsmith's, etc.

After I had explained the play of "Othello" some school girls asked me if I had that story in a book. And every one who saw the pictures expressed themselves as well pleased, but said they would not have understood them without the explanation.

Don't let us have silly or vulgar subjects. Don't let us be like the minister who thought by using slang and, as he said, getting on the level of his people he could help them. He did not. He only disgusted all, even those who used slang.

Yours truly,
DREAMLAND THEATER COMPANY.

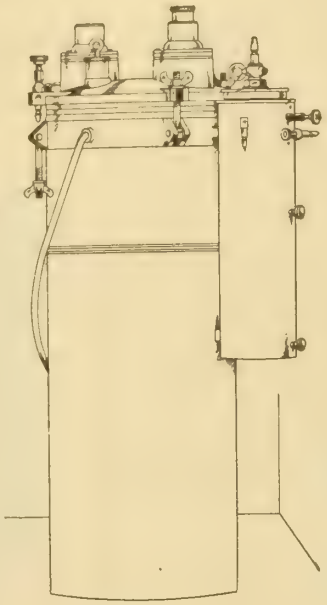
PORTABLE GAS-MAKING OUTFIT
EDISON OXYGEN GENERATOR



What Motion Picture Exhibitor has not at times wished that he had a reliable and inexpensive means for producing gas that would render him independent of the electric light companies? Traveling Exhibitors, especially, have often felt the need of a good outfit that would take the place of calcium outfits, which are frequently difficult to get or are held up in transit when wanted the most.

The Edison Oxygen Generator and Saturator fill this need. They have been designed to produce a complete generating outfit to take the place of Oxygen and Hydrogen gas sold in cylinders. This apparatus produces the gases automatically, in a safe, simple and direct manner, without the necessity of any knowledge of chemistry on the part of the operator.

The Oxygen is produced by the reaction between water and a compound of which Sodium Peroxide is the principal ingredient. This compound in its most compact and convenient form is known as Oxone, though the Generator will work equally well with another form of the compound known as Oxylithe.

Retorts, rubber bags, wash bottles, pumps and cylinders are entirely done away with. There is nothing to do but to put in the Compound and water, attach the gas outlet to the Ether Saturator and adjust the flame by the needle valves on the Saturator. The apparatus does the rest.

We want every present or prospective Motion Picture Exhibitor to write us for detailed information about this outfit.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

THE EAVESDROPPER.—The inevitable result of eavesdropping is at best a pseudo-gratification, for the listener rarely hears anything of a pleasant nature. An old Spanish Hidalgo becomes deeply involved in financial reverses and Manuella, a wealthy ranchero, helps him out. However, things have gone from bad to worse, and the old man finds himself at the mercy of Manuella, who, while not of the Draconian nature, of course expects his money or the security. He calls to apprise the old man that his notes are overdue, and insists upon a settlement, which the poor old fellow is unable to do. While there he meets Mercedes, the old man's beautiful daughter, and falls deeply in love with her, and offers to cancel the obligations for the daughter's hand in marriage. Now Mercedes is enamored of Carlos, a poor peon of the village, whom she loves in return and when the suggestion of the ranchero is broached she indignantly repulses it. However, upon realizing her poor father's condition she decides to make the sacrifice and consents. She then bids Carlos call to see her to break the unpleasant intelligence to him and part company. The lover calls and is almost heart-broken when Mercedes tells him the sad news. While they are engaged in the act of separating, the ranchero enters the adjoining room and through the half open door hears the sorrowful word of the last farewell between the young couple. He is so touched by the pure, self sacrificing love of the lovers, that he softens and feels he is worthy of bitter reproach for being the instrument of tearing asunder two trusting hearts such as these, so he makes up his mind that such shall not be. He then enters the room, and bidding the young ones to be of good heart, he not only joins their hands in bonds of true love, but makes them a present of the promissory notes which he had threateningly held over her father's head but a few moments before. This is one case of where eavesdropping was attended by ecstatic results. Length, 644 feet.

THE SUICIDE CLUB.—This is a broad comedy subject, the theme of which we often encounter in the newspapers. A body of disgruntled grouches band together in view of shuffling off this mortal coil in a spectacular manner. With this object to the fore the Suicide Club of America holds its monthly meeting to select the next candidate for mortuary honors. Lots are drawn and Frank Fairmount picks the fatal card "23." The President then presents Frank with the necessary skidoo instruments—a pistol, a dagger, a bottle of poison and a rope—and wishes him success. Frank arrives home at the same time as a letter addressed to him which informs him that he has fallen heir to $50,000. Now to commit suicide under these conditions is out of the question. The members are very much upset by not seeing notice of Frank's demise in the newspaper, so they go in a body to ascertain the cause. Frank meets them with a paper to sign releasing him from his oath, but they indignantly refuse until he closes the door and turns on the gas. Now while they would speed the parting guest, they are loath to go with him, so they sign. Length, 318 feet.

THE NOTE IN THE SHOE.—As water is bound to find its level so the soul will find its mate. Cupid is a wise old owl, youthful though he is portrayed, and plays the game of hearts with the same far-sighted calculation as the chess fiend studies his board. Disparity of rank is a trifling obstacle, when it may seem to us unsurmountable. Then again he knows our hearts better than we do ourselves and will by cunning tricks lead us to a goal most to our fancy, yet unsought. The pretty little romance which forms the plot of this subject shows one of the subtle ways he has in bringing about the affined condition in two hearts entirely unlooked for. Ella Berling is engaged as a shoe packer at the Lone Star Shoe Factory, and by way of a lark, and egged on by her companions, writes a note of usual type and places it in the lining of a shoe. The shoe is one of a consignment to a retailer, and falls into the hands of one of his best customers, although an awful grouch. In a fury he returns the shoes with what he considers an insulting note, and declares he will buy his shoes elsewhere in the future. The dealer is at first inclined to feel amused over the incident, but when he realizes the loss he suffers, he at once writes of the affair to the manufacturer. The result is that Ella is called before the proprietor and fired. However, her sweet, innocent face makes such an impression on the proprietor that he reconsiders her dismissal and she returns to work. He now sees her often as she busies herself among the others packing shoes, and the more he sees her the more impressed he becomes, until at length—Well, she is simply out of place as far as he is concerned, and with some trumped up offense she is fired again. Sorrowfully she goes home and to her mother's query as to why she was discharged she has no answer for she does not know. She can simply sigh forth the time-worn expression, "I didn't do anything." While they are sorrowing there is a knock, and mother answers, opening the door to the boss. He enters sternly and starts in to scold Ella unsparingly, finishing by saying

ONE BUSY HOUR.—Jim Smith kept a grocery story and business got so quiet that his hardest work was to keep his clerks awake. He at length decided to sell out and inserted an advertisement in the paper to that effect. Well Old Hiram Greengage sees the "ad" and calls on Smith at his residence and promises to look the store over. Jim gets busy and gathering his friends together gives each a dollar note with which to come to the store and make purchases while Hiram is there. Well, you would think a cyclone had struck the place. Mobs of customers are clamoring to be waited on and the efforts of Jim and the clerks are taxed to the limit. Things certainly do look rosy for Jim, when Hiram leaves apparently satisfied saying he will let him know in an hour. Later Jim receives a note—"Dear Mr. Smith: Your store has all the business you claim, but I am too old to take charge of such a rushing business. Yours, Hiram Greengage." Now wouldn't it jar you? A ROAD TO LOVE.—The theme of our picture is love. A young American engineer, sent to Central America to build an electric road, is prevented surveying over the plantation of a wealthy planter.

The engineer visits the planter's home to plead, and meets his beautiful daughter. An army officer, a rejected suitor, becomes insanely jealous.

The engineer's appeal proves fruitless. The engineer determines to push the work at night, but is discovered. The daughter, in her father's absence, goes armed to prevent the work.

She is surprised to find the engineer, for whom she has conceived a liking, in charge. But duty forbids sentiment, and she tries to be very masterful in her opposition.

They parley, and Eunice, while trying to be firm, is not obstinate. She sends for lunch, and invites the engineer to partake. The father and officer arrive.

The father sends the girl home and orders the engineer away. He dismisses his workmen and quietly departs. He is followed by the officer and accused of trying to win the girl.

The officer shoots the engineer, and tries to conceal the crime by firing the brush. The girl hears the shot and hastens to the spot. She saves the engineer from a fiery death.

She nurses the engineer back to health. During his convalescence a letter arrives ordering him to complete the road in two weeks in order to hold the franchise. The girl resolves to complete the road for him and it is finished within the appointed time.

The excitement causes a relapse. In his delirium he sets forth to finish his work. He is brought back unconscious. When he recovers his memory is gone.

Eunice and the engineer, while walking, come upon the road suddenly. The sight restores his memory.

Overcome, he declares his love. He has earned the "right of way" to a woman's heart, and double happiness crowns his recovery. App. length, 950 feet.

FUSS AND FEATHERS.—The day Mrs. Bangs purchased her new Easter bonnet will ever be remembered by Mr. Bangs as one of calamity.

Primarily, his irascibility is responsible for the sum total of his misfortunes.

Resting in the sitting room, his wife's entrance disturbs him—Mrs. Bangs worships at the altar of "Fashion—A "Peach Basket" creation of heroic size, entirely covered with fruit and floral decorations, is the latest acquisition to her wardrobe—She displays it with pride to her husband, who bitterly denounces her extravagance. In a war or words Mrs. Bangs is victorious. Mr. Bangs leaves the house, seeking rest under the shade of the porch. The cook, ignorant of his presence, showers him with chicken feathers, much to his discomfort.

Nervous, he decides on a quiet smoke in the dressing room—a match thrown on the floor ignites a pillow—it bursts into flames—instant action is necessary—in his excitement he uses his wife's hat to smother the burning pillow—the fire out he finds that the hat is ruined. Hearing footsteps, and fearful of her wrath, he hides the smoking creation in the bed tick and escapes out the window on to the freshly painted sill—doing this he virtually jumps from the frying pan into the fire.

Mr. Bangs is smeared from head to foot with new paint—the painter is greatly incensed, but listens to the unlucky man's explanation of the situation. Unfortunately, in his agitation he overturns the paint pot. The painter's sympathy turns to anger—he forces Mr. Bangs back through the window and follows him into the room.

Mrs. Bangs demands explanations, which the painter spitefully proffers—the hat is brought out of the feather bed—the sight of her ruined "Peach Basket" throws her into a violent rage—ignoring explanations she seizes her unhappy husband and smothers him with feathers until he begs for mercy. Approx. length, 605 feet.

THE DOCTORED DINNER PAIL.—Harrigan, a helper on a steam road roller, after a hard morning's work, finds a comfortable seat on the roller and proceeds to enjoy his noon hour lunch—reinforced by a generous pail of beer.

The engineer, a practical joker, observing Harrigan's peaceful attitude, slyly pours some machine oil into his beer and hides to watch the result. Harrigan's next sip causes him to bounce up in bewilderment.

Harrigan realizes the joke, and, to get even, pours the beer into the water tank of the roller. Then the trouble begins. The roller begins to act in a very queer way. The engineer loses confrol of it, and it rushes up and down the streets like a thing possessed.

On its return trip it runs over Harrigan, who has been standing in the middle of the road enjoying the engineer's predicament, and flattens him out like a pancake. The engineer is horrified and gets an air-pump and tries to restore Harrigan.

In this he succeeds, but finds that Harrigan is entirely too tall, so he gets the heavy wooden sledge and hammers him down. More trouble—for now Harrigan is crushed into the semblance of a dwarf, and he tries the air-pump again, with success.

Finally, with the aid of a shovel, the air-pump and sledge hammer, he moulds poor Harrigan into shape—and with a sigh of relief returns to his roller, which has sobered up by this time—and all three resume their toil nothing the worse for the adventure. Approx. length, 305 feet.

A MEXICAN'S GRATITUDE.—A Western ranchman, going home to transact business, leaves his horse in front of his house. A "bad man of the West," coming along, purloins the animal to gain money with which to purchase whiskey. We next see him visiting his favorite resort—the town tavern—and while he is in the saloon the horse takes fright and runs away. A Mexican, sitting in front of his adobe hut, sees the horse and immediately gets his own mount and starts in pursuit, capturing the runaway, after several exciting chases. In the meantime the ranchman, discovering the theft of his horse, immediately organizes a posse to hunt for the thief. A bunch of cow-punchers capture the Mexican who is now leading the runaway horse. They lead him to a tree, for swift justice is always handed out to horse thieves. They work quietly and determinedly. The sheriff hears of the lynching and comes upon the cow-punchers just in time to save the poor innocent Mexican. The sheriff is about to lead the Mexican away under arrest when the ranchman appears with the real thief whom he has captured, proving his guilt by the gloves he has on, which were also stolen. The real thief acknowledges the crime, and the Mexican, to show his gratitude, tells the sheriff that he will always be his friend, at the same time handing him a half card on which is written "Gratitude." This card to be a momentum of friendship and faithfulness. Five years have now passed: the former sheriff has fallen in love with a girl of the West. Another cow-puncher loves the same girl. He does not try to win the girl's love, but when he learns that she favors the former sheriff, he devises a plan by which to rid himself of his rival. He accidentally discovers a former sweetheart of the sheriff imploring him to take her back, which he refuses to do. The cow-puncher asks the rejected girl if she wants revenge. She consents to do anything that will bring her revenge. She writes a letter to him at the dictation of the cow-puncher, saying if he will meet her once more she will go away forever. This letter is sent, and the cow-puncher gets the sweetheart of the former sheriff and takes her to the meeting place. Just as she comes upon the scene she sees the Spanish girl throw her arms [illegible] sweetheart's neck.

The sheriff tries to explain, but she will not listen, and goes away with the cow-puncher, who is gloating over his success. The sheriff now sees the trick that has been played. He has a bitter fight with the cow-puncher, and forces him to confess his treachery. The cow-puncher goes to a Mexican's hut, and offers two greasers a certain sum of money to do his bidding. The three lie in wait for the sheriff and his sweetheart, overpower them, and drag them to the greaser's hut. Inside the cow-puncher tantalizes the sheriff, and then removes the girl to another room. The Mexican finds himself out of tobacco. Seeing some in the sheriff's flannel shirt pocket, he immediately helps himself, and in pulling out the sack of tobacco he pulls out a card, which proves to be the other half of the card that the Mexican has been carrying for five years, that he might repay his former rescuer. The cow-puncher comes back while the Mexican is comparing the two halves of the card, and when the cow-puncher again grabs the sheriff, the Mexican asks him if this card was given to him by a man he saved from lynching. The sheriff replies yes. The Mexican then unties the sheriff just as the cow-puncher is about to strike another blow. A thrilling fight ensues in which the sheriff whips the cow-puncher, and is choking him to insensibility when the girl reappears. She sees the situation and tells her sweetheart to let the villain go. Length, 1,000 feet.

FORGOTTEN.—This story illustrates the anguish of a young sailor who after a series of misfortunes, covering a period of many years, returns to his home and finds that his sweetheart, whose memory urged him to renewed efforts despite almost insurmountable difficulties, has transferred her affections to another and that he has been entirely forgotten.

Before starting on the eventful voyage the young sailor celebrates his engagement in sumptuous manner. The vessel sails and the maiden waves a tender farewell to her betrothed.

Not long after one of the other sailors returns with news of a serious disaster at sea and the probable loss of all on board. Momentarily, the grief is intense but as time goes on the tender heart again assumes the natural buoyancy and the maiden receives the attentions of other admirers.

Several years have elapsed and another engagement is celebrated. An unkind fate at this moment allows the appearance of the former betrothed. Years of hardship and toil have been endured by him to be able to return to home and happiness, but the bitter disappointment and anguish of his soul is portrayed in his features as he peers through the window of the home, where he was wont to call and while away his leisure hours, and sees that he has been forgotten and all memory of him a thing of the past. Length, 990 feet.

THE PEDDLER'S REWARD. In a cluster of woods not far from his home a farmer is cutting timber and is accidentally caught under a falling tree. Fortunately his little daughter is at hand and she hurriedly rushes to the road where she meets a peddler whom she begs for assistance. This is not denied and the unfortunate father is soon rescued from his precarious position and conveyed to his home on the back of the peddler's donkey.

The same day the little girl meets two vagrants leading the donkey laden with the peddler's wares. She seeks and finds the peddler, who is greatly excited because of his loss, having been asleep at the tavern when his property was taken from him. The alarm is sounded and the men taken into custody.

The story beautifully illustrates the adage, "A kind Action is Never Lost." Length, 463 feet.

NEW PAIN KILLER.—A rip-roaring comedy sure to win a storm of applause. Sauntering down the street a young man experiences a severe attack of toothache and hurries into a dentist's office to have the offending tooth extracted. Instead, however, the doctor quiets the nerve by a spray of antiseptic fluid. The pain disappears as if by magic but the entire body becomes insensible to pain.

Reading the paper as he leisurely walks along he attempts to cross the street and is run down by a passing carriage, but he gets up and finds no harm done him by the accident.

Later he approaches a fortress where he is met by a guard with the "Halt! Who goes there?" which he ignores entirely and thereupon the guard pierces him with the bayonet, but even this causes him no concern and he smilingly continues his path to the utter consternation of the guard.

Soon after he is attacked by several highwaymen who beat him up severely and most brutally, but he passes after the conflict and goes on about his business without the least concern.

In the terrace of a cafe the waiter drops a tray of glassware upon our friend, but this causes him no worry and after paying the bill he saunters on.

The strength of the antiseptic spray, however, having been dissipated, our friend again experiences the toothache and in apparently a more violent form than before and when shortly after a pedestrian runs into him it so arouses his ire that he attacks him furiously, shaking him up in the same manner as a dog would a rat.

The comedy hit of the season. Length, 370 feet.

FOUR FOOTED HAWKSHAW.—A dramatic presentation illustrating remarkable canine sagacity.

Farmer Lorin returning with cattle meets Vallon, his landlord, who calls for his rent. Lorin tells him he will be able to pay in two days as he expects to sell some of his cattle at the county fair the next day. Lorin takes his cattle to the fair and succeeds in making sale thereof. Seated at a table he counts the money received and taking a drink returns to his home. Picard, a friend, seated at the same table observes Lorin putting away his money and follows at a distance. Upon arriving at his home Lorin secretes his money in the bottom of the cupboard and retires. Picard watching at the window soon also enters and takes the money, departing by way of the window. Hurrying to the woods he hides his booty under a tree and returns to his home.

The following day Vallon calls and when Lorin goes to get his money, its loss is discovered, causing great consternation. The police are called and a detective is given charge of the case. The latter takes his dog and the two are soon on the ground where the dog takes the most active part in tracing the thief. By a peculiar incident the dog locates the thief and then follows him as he goes to the woods to find the money secreted the night before. The detective and police following the trail catch him as he is digging up the ill-gotten treasure. The story concludes with a view of the detective and the dog. Excellent photographic quality and extraordinary effects in night scenes. Length, 590 feet.

WHY THE MAIL WAS LATE.—Out on a Western reservation an Indian mail carrier waits for the mail, which is handed him out of a passing train. He then goes on his route but is waylaid by three outlaws who stab him and get away with the mail bag. True to his oath to deliver the mail, the Indian drags himself after the outlaws and surprises them at a lonely spot just as they are going through the mail. He steals a revolver out of one's pocket and with three well directed shots, fells the robbers. He then picks up the mail and even though wounded to death, drags himself to the next station. He is seen by cowboys who come to his rescue but it was too late; the loss of blood was too great. He delivers the mail and having performed his last duty, he expires. The vision of an angel appears, crowning him with a laurel wreath for duty well performed. Length, 610 feet.

INVENTIONS OF AN IDIOT.—An eccentric looking man in his laboratory is visited by a friend to whom he shows his latest inventions. The first one is a baby incubator, a most astonishing invention. He next puts his visitor into a tonsorial cabinet from which he emerges minus beard and hair. The visitor is most indignant. The inventor quietly pushes him back into the cabinet—a few backward movements and the visitor appears again with a luxurious growth of hair and beard. The next invention shown to the visitor is a jig-saw puzzle which is solved in record breaking time. After this the inventor takes his visitor into his flivmobile. They are off at a speed of 200 miles an hour. Suddenly the automobile explodes and the two drop to earth. The visitor does not want to see any more. A pressure on the push button and he is thrown out of the door. Length, 295 feet.

BOYS WILL BE BOYS.—Two mischievous boys with energy plus start out to do things and from what is seen in this film they succeed fairly well. The first sufferer is a caller for sister. They put glue in his high hat with the result that the wig sticks to the hat and the baldheaded suitor is refused. It is wonderful how many new tricks the boys find to play on people they meet, but boys will be boys. The finish of the picture shows that even boys will be good when they are asleep. Length, 595 feet.

THE HOUSE OF TERROR.—Out in the country stands an old castle-like building at the windows of which are seen at night frightful scenes. The excited country folks decide to investigate the matter. One nice evening they arm themselves with guns and pitchforks and other useful instruments and break into the house just as—from the appearance on the window shade—a terrible tragedy is taking place. When the intruders come into the room they find Prof. Pianini conducting a musical rehearsal. The well meaning countrymen are thrown out of the house and the Professor is not molested any more. Length, 230 feet.

PATHE FRERES

YOUR TURN, MARQUIS. An old marquis, who is in love with a pretty maiden many years his junior, chances one day to meet the latter out strolling with a young man who seems to be very much in love with the gentle miss. The old fellow becomes enraged at the effrontery of his hated rival and causes the latter from the side of the young lady, after which he (the Marquis) follows the girl to her home, where he keeps a close watch lest the youth should return and steal his adored one. Finally the young man puts in an appearance, and as he is trying to see the young lady, the suspicious old Marquis confronts him, and with the aid of some of the servants, overpowers the youth and carries him away to an old deserted tower, where he is bound hand and foot, locked up and left to his fate.

A little shepherd hears the distressed youth's cries and gives the alarm, which is responded to by some of the unfortunate fellow's companions. They go to the tower and liberate the prisoner, who, undaunted by his harrowing experience, starts out again to meet his lady love. He is successful, and the girl consents to run away with him, but as usual, the old Marquis is on the lookout and starts in pursuit of the fleeing pair. The latter lead the old fellow a merry chase into a remote part of the wood, where the crowd of friends are waiting to see the young couple get fair play. Just as the old Marquis is about to attack his rival the crowd of young men come forth, and seizing the old fellow, carry him to a large water tank and throw him in and as he flounders around helplessly in the icy water, the happy young couple make a quick departure. Length, 377 feet.

BETWEEN LOVE AND HONOR.—Two brothers, Harry and Frank, are in love with the same girl: Harry, the older one, being the choice of the gentle miss, is positive that some day in the near future he will make her his happy bride. He is not aware, however, that his brother Frank is his hated rival. The latter, although keeping his secret latent when in the presence of Harry, never misses an opportunity to impress upon the maiden his undying love, which eventually becomes so manifest that it causes the girl much annoyance, and she is compelled to treat him with scorn.

One day the two young men go hunting, and the young woman, feeling apprehensive as to her lover's safety in the company of his jealous brother, follows the pair. Arriving at a high cliff, Harry takes aim and fires at some game in a deep ravine, and in order to get his prey he is compelled to descend the side of the mountain. After tightly securing a rope around his waist he starts to make the descent while his brother holds the rope and guides him in his perilous trip. Taking advantage of the situation, the fiendish Frank conceives the idea that this is a good opportunity to rid himself of his rival, and is just about to cut the rope and precipitate his brother to his death when the horrified girl, who has been watching the proceedings, rushes up and pleads with the heartless fellow to spare the life of her lover. The fiendish youth consents to defer his purpose on condition that she will promise to marry him instead of his brother Harry. The distracted maiden, who is willing to sacrifice her happiness and even her life for her lover, reluctantly acquiesces to the presumptuous fiend's proposition.

The maiden then hurries away and the unsuspecting fellow is dragged from his precarious position and returns home with his deceitful brother, the latter never betraying the secret of his conquest over the noble girl.

Unable to bring herself to care for the cowardly fellow, the maiden writes him a note telling him that she can never prove unfaithful to her lover Harry, so she has decided to end it all by throwing herself into the river. Upon receiving the missive, the youth realizes that he alone is the cause of the poor girl's despair, and, becoming conscience-stricken, starts out to find her. He comes upon her at the brink of the river just as she is about to plunge herself into eternity, and rushing up, the youth seizes the forlorn girl and prevents her from carrying out her designs. After releasing her from her vow and promising her never to bother her again, he takes the girl home and turns her over to her fiance, and all bids fair for their future happiness. Length, 544 feet.

ZOU-ZOU, THE LUCKY DOG.—Zou-zou is an intelligent French poodle, the pet and companion of a rich old bachelor who is the possessor of a large fortune but who is without kin to inherit it after his death. One day he makes his will, in which he leaves all his money to the person who will take his dog and care for him after his death. He then puts the missive into the pocket in the dog's collar.

One day the unfortunate man is stricken and dies suddenly, and immediately the poor animal is turned out of the place without a friend to care for him. The dog wanders around the streets until he is spied by a little urchin who is returning from market with his poor old mother. The little fellow is so atracted by the animal that he pleads with his mother to allow him to take him home, and the kind-hearted woman finally consents, but is compelled to smuggle the dog into her apartments, as the laws of the house forbid the tenants keeping animals.

One day the little fellow takes the dog out and, stopping to play a game of marbles with some of his little companions, ties it to a bench. Soon two men come along and noticing the pretty dog, they cut the leash and steal away with it. They ill-treat the poor beast shamefully, and so the first chance he gets the animal makes his escape and starts out to find his new home, where he realizes that he is welcome. Arriving at the house, he bolts into the place, and the poor people are overjoyed to have him back again. Since the dog's departure the unfortunate family have had lots of trouble and are now being dispossessed for failing to pay their rent. They are just about to leave the house when the little boy spies the pocket in the dog's collar and opening it takes out the will. Upon reading the missive they are overjoyed and start out immediately to get possession of the money.

The last picture shows the happy family six months later, living in a pretty home and enjoying life without care or worry, and Zouzou, who is the good benefactor, has his place at the table and receives as much attention and kindness as one of the happy children. Length, 761 feet.

THANKSGIVING TURKEY.—In the first picture we see two children seated at the table waiting for their parents and a guest to come home and enjoy the turkey dinner. The youngsters keep picking at the turkey until the maid loses patience and takes it from the table and going over to an open window puts it on the sill in order to be out of the reach of the mischievous youngsters. The dinner guest arrives and when he sees the turkey he decides to have some fun, so taking it, he starts down the street. Before going far, he meets his friends, whose guest he is to be at dinner, and finding himself in an embarrassing position he throws the turkey into a manhole in the street. A fellow down in the sewer gets it, and after bringing it to the surface, lays it there for safekeeping. Soon a precocious youngster comes along and steals the bird and takes it home to his mother, who upon hearing where he got it hurriedly sends him back to return the stolen object to its owner. The little fellow meets the man who originally stole the bird, the latter who, when finding out that he will be without a dinner unless it is returned, is out trying to find it. When he sees it in the possession of the little fellow, he gives the latter a good sum and hurries back to the dinner party, where the host is patiently waiting its return before they can proceed with the dinner.

All hands are made happy through the droll transaction, for the little boy in question buys a good dinner for his poor little brothers, and the turkey, upon being returned to its original owners, serves its purpose adequately, for they are not long in cutting into it, unconscious of the many ordeals through which it passed. Length, 279 feet.

HAUNTED BY THE COPS.—This extremely funny film shows an unfortunate fellow who has been hounded by the cops to such an extent that he finally becomes unbalanced and fancies he sees a bluecoat at every turn. In the first picture he falls asleep on a bench when along comes a policeman and disturbs his peaceful slumbers by giving him a "hot foot" and ordering him to move on. The fellow makes for home and it seems as though, no matter where he glances, his eye rests on a cop, until he becomes distracted and rushes from his room only to find two more waiting for him in the hall. He gets into a cab and is driving along when suddenly the cabby turns into a policeman and proceeds to make life miserable for his fare. The latter, after leaving the cab, goes into a florist's and purchases a beautiful bequet, when to his amazement this, too, turns into a cop. Next he buys a suit of clothes, but on donning the outfit and looking at himself in the mirror, he is horrified to discover that it is a policeman's uniform. Disgusted by the terrible state of affairs, he rushes home again, and this time makes for the roof with the intention of ending his troubles by jumping off. We see him as he leans into space and are amazed to see that he strikes the sidewalk below with no serious results; strange to relate, however as he alights there stand directly in front of him two policemen, who drag him off to the station and lock him up for attempting suicide. Length, 407 feet.

INSTANTANEOUS NERVE POWDER.—A very nervous fellow makes his own as well as his good wife's life miserable by his sudden outbursts of nervousness, in which he loses all self-control and smashes everything within reach. Fortunately, his wife secures some sort of nerve powder which she uses with good results upon her better half. Taking the bellows she blows a little of it over her husband and immediately the powder strikes the unfortunate he becomes as buoyant and happy as a young kitten. He then takes the bellows and goes out on the street and everyone that he meets he gives them a dose of the powder and suddenly they are transformed into happy, dancing creatures, no matter how serious or nervous they are.

He comes upon a lot of people posing for a moving picture and the stage manager is in a regretful frame of mind caused by the stupidity of some of the performers. He gives them all a dose of the powder and they forget their troubles and smiles and all hands join in a happy revelry. He gets everyone on the street dancing and is having a fine time when a fellow comes along and steals the bellows and makes his escape. The fellow behind the thief and he thinking that he can have the same good results decides to give the chaps some of the nerve settling powder, but to his sorrow all the powder is used in the air and the policeman the right of way and a free use of the street in the rear of the moving picture is the effect he proves to be the most successful. Length, 282 feet.

A CHINESE WEDDING.—This interesting picture [illegible] and shows the [illegible] which the celestials celebrate a wedding.

The first picture shows the ceremony, then the young couple receiving the congratulations of their friends. One particular proceeding worthy of special note is the manner in which the friends of the couple parade through the streets of the town, bearing all the magnificent presents, giving the whole population an opportunity of seeing the many gifts. Some of the beautiful presents are shown at close range, and they are indeed magnificent works of Oriental art and craftsmanship. Length, 280 feet.

THE WAY TO HAPPINESS.—A struggling young artist, who feels the pangs of poverty keenly, finds himself in a very precarious position, caused by the lack of money, but his faithful little wife remains steadfast in her belief that better days are coming, and in her gentle and encouraging manner urges him on to success. When prosperous days dawn the weakness of his character is manifested, for he soon forgets the little woman who stood by him in the days of adversity, and falls a victim to the charms of a pretty woman who comes to his studio to engage him to paint her portrait. He makes several trips to the latters home before the picture is completed, and it is only a matter of days before he is infatuated with the woman's charms and his old love for his good wife sinks into oblivion. One days the lady in question comes to his studio, and while he is making desperate love to her, his wife comes in and catches him. After ordering the woman from the place, the wife remonstrates with her husband for his unbecoming conduct, after which she leaves him and starts out to face the world alone.

The unfaithful artist finds consolation in the love of his fascinating patroness, but one day he comes in unexpectedly and discovers her in the embrace of another man. He gets little satisfaction when he remonstrates with her and she gives him to understand that she is tired of his attentions and wishes in the future to see no more of him. Realizing at last his great folly, the artist goes to his room, where he secures a gun and decides to end his miserable existence. The servant hears the report of the gun and rushes to the room only to find the man badly wounded. Medical aid is quickly summoned and the artist revived.

The good wife reads the account of the would-be suicide in the paper, and true to her nature, she hurries to the injured man's bedside, and through her good care soon has him able to go about. The foolish fellow, feeling that he has learned his lesson, turns again to his old tried and true love and in the last picture we see the couple once more united and living for one another's happiness alone. Length, 476 feet.

CHINATOWN SLAVERY.—Strange as it may seem to the average citizen of these enlightened times, slavery still exists, and a traffic in human beings is carried on to-day, in open defiance of our laws.

True the perpetrators are heathens, and never have, nor will they ever acknowledge the laws of the government under which they gain their livelihood. How our laws are thus openly defied is clearly set forth in this picture story of an instance of slavery, recently unearthed in San Francisco by the efforts of a Presbyterian minister.

Lee Chang, a Christianized Chinaman, a convert of the Bush Street Mission, had sent to China for his boyhood sweetheart, San Tao. Upon her arrival in America he places her with a Chinese family in Chinatown.

After his day's work he returns one evening to be greeted with the startling information that the dealers have kidnapped San Tao and spirited her away. Lee locates her hiding place, then sends to the Mission for help, and upon receiving the news the minister in charge calls several secret service officers, and the search begins.

The Chinese boy whose services Lee had enlisted to deliver the note agrees to lead the officers to where Lee is on the watch.

Chow Low, a high-class Chinese merchant, has cast lecherous eyes on pretty San Tao, and we see him arrive at the slave dealer's headquarters to consummate her purchase.

Lee, hidden under the balcony of the building where the woman he loves is held captive, is startled when she appears at the window and informs him that Chow Low is inside. Rendered desperate by this intelligence, the brave lad determines to act alone. Signalling his sweetheart to drop the rope ladder used as a fire escape over the balcony, he ascends and conceals himself just as Chow Low is ushered into the slave room by one of the keepers. Chow attempts to caress pretty San Tao, when the lover springs from his hiding place, and with a well-directed blow between the eyes, floors the astonished merchant.

Lee and San Tao make a dash for liberty, they descend the ladder in safety, only to be surrounded by a horde of Chow's aides who quickly seize the girl, but Lee fights his way through [illegible] pursued by Chow and his crowd. Lee eludes them once by a clever ruse, but they discover that they are on the wrong track, and [illegible] the Joss house door as his pursuers [illegible] the street. A pine vender seated near the door has noticed Lee's excited appearance and informs Chow of his quarry's hiding place. Our hero knowing the superstitious nature of his enemies, sees an opportunity to outwit them; he will change places with the Joss and at the right moment come to life.

The scene that follows is ludicrous in the extreme; a crowd of worshipers arive as Chow and his follows appear, and as all bow to the idol, their amazement may be realized as the mighty Joss steps from his pedestal and begins a grotesque dance.

The howling heathens flee for their lives, doughty Chow in the lead. Lee's messenger runs in; he too is prostrated with fear at the sight of a living Joss until Lee's well-known voice acquaints him with the deception. Telling Lee that help is below, and that his sweetheart is concealed in a neighboring restaurant, they at once join forces with the officers of the law, and a raid on the joint is determined upon.

They descend the stairs to find a slumming party enjoying the mysteries of Chinese cookery, but they do not find Chow and his crowd; they have mysteriously disappeared.

The quick-witted boy points out their possible means of escape; he discovers a crack in the floor which upon examination discloses a pair of steps leading to an underground room.

The minister and Lee descend while the officers place the crowd under arrest until the search is over.

The minister and Lee are horrified to find at the foot of the stairs an underground river and that Chow has eluded pursuit and taken the girl with him in a boat.

Lee frenzied with grief seizes one of Chow's servants, and wrapping the cooly's cue around his throat, chokes him into submission and forces him to disclose the outlet of this cunningly devised underground means of escape.

To drag their captive up to the street, secure a carriage and drive for the outlet is the next move in the game of hide and seek.

With a revolver placed to the cooly's temple, the carriage is rapidly driven to the outskirts of the city, a sewer opening is pointed out by the terrified cooly. Lee throws the cover off and descends just in time to drop on Chow's shoulders; a brief struggle and San Tao is passed up to the minister, followed by Lee.

The minister consoles the weeping girl by telling her that she and Lee must be married at once.

At the mission American clothes are provided for Lee and his prospective bride by the mission converts, and Lee is given the legal right to protect San Tao always. Length, 795 feet.

GRIN AND WIN; Or, Converted By a Billiken.—Our picture opens in the home of Mr. Sour Face. The family, consists of Mr. Sour Face and wife and a boy and girl, are just finishing breakfast. The youngsters start for school; the man and his wife have their customary spat, after which Sour Face leaves for his office. On his way he passes a billboard, where an artist is drawing a figure of Billiken. A crowd stands about laughing, but Sour Face, true to his name, refuses to smile and walks on, disgusted. At the office, Mr. Jolly enters, carrying a package containing a Billiken. The clerks gather about as he removes the paper and explains its virtues. They each, in turn, tickle Billiken's feet, and are convulsed with laughter. Sour Face enters, and at once the atmosphere changes. Jolly tries to interest him in Billiken, but without success; so leaves the figure on the desk and goes about his work. Sour Face cannot resist the spell, looks about, sees that no one is watching, tickles Billiken's feet, and smiles for the first time in years. The clerks, from their different desks, are watching the proceedings and laugh among themselves. Returning home, the new convert passes the billboard again; this time stops and gazes at the figure. Immediately the Billiken commences to laugh. Sour Face joining in, when Jolly comes along and tells his friend where to buy one of the figures. Sour Face enters the store, purchases a Billiken, and walks off, laughing, in spite of all efforts to look stern. On the way home he finds a pocketbook; good luck already. He reaches home, finding the rest of the family looking gloomy, as usual. He tries to cheer them, opens the package, shows Billiken and explains its virtues to his family. He finally persuades them to tickle the feet, and as each one does so they laugh heartily. Even the pictures on the wall change their sour expressions to laughter. As he retires, Sour Face gazes fondly at Billiken, then drops off to sleep. He dreams that he is Billiken and is being exhibited in the shop windows; then Billiken takes his place in the bed. He wakes up in the morning, finding the figure opposite the bed, and laughs heartily in the change of his disposition, due to the influences of Billiken. Length, 485 feet.

PLAIN MAME; Or, All that Glitters is Not Gold.—Outside the factory gate, Jim, a would-be fashion plate, is waiting for his sweetheart—Mame. She presently appears, joins her steady, and they proceed homeward. Jim has tickets for the theater, and when he asks her to accompany him she is delighted. At the theater that evening a number is on as they enter and take their seats. The leading lady makes eyes at Jim, and he is at once fascinated, forgetting the girl beside him. He excuses himself for a moment, goes to the stage door, where he leaves a note, making an appointment for the next evening. The following day Jim is not at the gate, as has been his custom, and Mame is broken hearted. Tom, another young fellow, not so stylish as Jim, has long been an admirer of Mame, and, upon seeing her jilted in this manner, determines to urge his suit. He invites the girl to an East Side ball, and incidentally mentions that Jim will be there with the chorus girl. Mame determines to go, takes the money saved for her wedding outfit, hires a fancy ball gown and hat to match, has her hair dressed becomingly, and with Tom goes to the ball. Here she is easily the belle, and is besieged by all the men for a dance. Jim comes along with the chorus girl, is astounded at the change in his former sweetheart; compares Mame to his present escort, to the detriment of the latter. He is beside himself with rage as he sees Tom escorting Mame, goes to her, begs for forgiveness, and asks for a dance. Tom stands aside, anxiously waiting for her answer. Mame looks Jim over in silence. She has discovered his true worth, as well as the sterling qualities of Tom, takes the latter's arm and walks away. Length, 480 feet.

WHERE THERE'S A WILL, THERE'S A WAY.—Squire Hardacre, of Gloucester, has a son, Harold, studying in London. He receives news that his son is engaged to marry an actress—Letitia Langdon. The news is conveyed in a letter to his friend, Parson Johnson. The Squire is furious, writes a letter to Harold, telling him that he will cut him off with a shilling if he marries the actress; also that he will visit London himself. Harold receives the letter; shows it to Letitia. After thinking over its contents, she has a plan of campaign and sends Harold off o meet his father. The Squire arrives by coach; Harold receives him and pretends obedience. The old gentleman is taken off to Letitia's lodgings, where she bribes the servants not to answer his bell. She does so herself, and makes herself so useful to the old gentleman, attending to all his wants, that he determines that Harold shall marry her. Obtaining a promise from his son that he will not marry without his consent, he proceeds to press his son's suit with Letitia. She pretends coyness, but at last consents, and the Squire, by the help of a special license and his friend, the parson, sees them married and started off on their honeymoon, and it is only the next day that he learns to his dismay that the Letitia Brown whom his son had married at his instigation is the same person as Letitia Langdon, the actress, to whom he so violently objected. NAT PINKERTON: Or, The Lost Child.—Sam Sander is a professional marriage swindler. We see him leaving his fiancee, the young and wealthy Miss Durban, and going to the wealthy widow, Mrs. Brown. He proposes to her and is accepted. Before he leaves his second fiancee her little son, Billy, passes them with his bicycle, just as Sam Sander and Miss Durban are intimately greeting each other.

As Sander sees that he is discovered, he goes to see a man named Fagin, who has before rendered him several services of an obscure nature, for which he pays him well. To get the unpleasant witness out of the way, some street urchins catch Billy in the street and take him to Fagin where he is detained.

When Sander in the evening pays a visit to Mrs. Brown, he finds her suffused with tears, because Billy has not yet come home. Sander promises to try and find the child. An hour later he comes back to Mrs. Brown, telling her that he has been unsuccessful. But now the unfortunate mother decides to go to the famous detective, Nat Pinkerton, and ask for his assistance. Fagin has noticed her going away, follows after, and sees her in the street speaking to Nat Pinkerton. He hurries home.

There stands Nat Pinkerton cool and quiet. Tommy swings his cudgel against Nat Pinkerton, but the detective stoops down quickly and catches hold of Tommy's leg, thus pulling him to the ground, while he with a blow of his whistle, calls the policemen to his assistance. In a minute they have handcuffs put on the criminal and the boy is released. Billy is at once brought back to his mother and Nat Pinkerton and his assistant now try to catch the leader. But when they arrive at Sam Sander's house, the criminal has disappeared. Nat Pinkerton succeeds in catching Sam Sander, just as he with revolver in hand tries to force Miss Durban to give up her money.

As the rascal sees that everything is lost, he attempts to shoot Nat Pinkerton, but the assistant takes hold of his arm and holds him firmly so that the shot has no effect.

Now, Nat Pinkerton's work is finished, and with some friendly words to the heartbroken Miss Durban he quietly leaves the room.

This film, in which the plot is most exciting - although no crime has been committed -will surely prove a good drawer for any exhibitor. Excellency of staging and photography of the usual high standard. Length, 800 feet.

THE DONKEY THAT WAS NOT AN ASS. is a comedy subject by Raleigh & Roberts. The story opens by displaying before us a country road, upon which are traveling three men, supposed to be robbers. One of them discovers a peasant coming along the road with a donkey. They decide to rob him of the animal and hide in bushes and wait until he appears. He arrives in due time, and is robbed of his animal. The three men lead the donkey to a private house, which they rob, and hide their booty in the baskets which are placed on the donkey's back. They have some trouble leading the ass to their rendezvous, but they finally reach it, and remove the stolen goods from the baskets on the donkey's back. When the robbers are inside of the place the donkey runs home, and the owner of it is so pleased that he kisses her. He happens to look into one of the baskets on the donkey's back, and finds a sack containing money. He is overwhelmed with joy. In the meantime police officers arrive and take the owner of the donkey to the police station, apparently for putting them on a wild goose chase for the donkey, which had returned home. While he is in the police station the donkey arrives, pulls the bell cord, and immediately an officer responds. The donkey leads the officers to the robbers' rendezvous where they are arrested. Length, 561 feet.

THE DETECTIVES' RUSE.—A dramatic film by Hepwix. The film starts by showing us the exterior of a police station, and a peasant telling an officer of his troubles. The next scene shows us the robbers at work; they secure their booty and escape. Just as they are emerging from the house they encounter the proprietor, who having disguised himself as an old man, is seated in a wheeled chair. The old man asks the robbers to take him for a stroll, which they subsequently do. They in the meantime have their booty placed at the feet of the old man in his chair. While they are passing a cigar store, the old man requests them to go inside and purchase some cigars. They do so. They pass by a liquor store, and the old man requests them to go inside and get beer for themselves and bring out a glass for him. While they are doing this, the old man whistles for police, and two policemen appear; he instructs them what to do, and when the two robbers emerge with the beer they are arrested. Length, 300 feet.

THE CHAMBERMAID AND THE DWARF (Eclair Company).—Mr. Jack advertises for a chambermaid, and in response to the advertisement a pretty girl answers. She is employed at once. When she is in the pantry, the butler makes love to her, and in doing so, they turn over a table on which are many dishes, bowls, etc. She gets angry at this, and throws the butler out of the room. In the meantime a dwarf appears, and by his mysterious power places together all the broken crockery. She thanks him, and he disappears. We next see the girl bringing up tea for her employer, who subsequently makes love to her. While he is doing so, his wig flies off his head. She runs out of the room. His wig in due time returns on his head. We next see the girl out in the yard washing clothes; the butler is trying to make love to her she objects. The dwarf appears here again, gives the butler and her employer, who had just appeared, a beating, and then disappears. We next see them in the house. The maid is helping her employer put his coat on. He mysteriously disappears while she is doing so, and in his place the little dwarf appears. He executes some phenomenal tricks, and disappears. She is having too much trouble with her employer, butler and the dwarf so she decides to leave. Length, 377 feet.

EASTER BELLS (Lux).—This drama opens by showing us the exterior of a church, into which many are going. We next see father and son tolling the bell, which appears to be quite a task by the way they are struggling with it. Having finished their work they go to dinner. The son refuses to eat, and subsequently goes out. We next see him on his way to his "affinity." He meets her on the door step of her home and takes her to his home. He asks his father if he could marry. He is refused, and is also thrown out of the house. Several years have now elapsed, and we see the boy's father and mother seated at a table weeping. It is time for him to toll the bell, but he is too weak to do so. He falls asleep and dreams that angels appear and do his work; he also sees his son, with his wife and a little child along the roadside. He wakes up, and goes back and tells his wife of his dream. While he is doing so, they hear a knock at the door, and when his wife opens it, in walks his son, wife and their little child. The young man's mother takes the child, kisses it, and they are forgiven. Length, 575 feet.

SERVICE OF A FRIEND (Itala) tells the story of a soldier who leaves for the war and entrusts his wife to his friend for safe keeping. Returning unexpectedly he enters a cafe with his comrades and while they are having some refreshments he overhears his wife's voice in conversation with his false friend in an adjoining room. He surprises [illegible] a combat ensues.

COUNTESS VALLERIA OF ISSOGNE (Ambrosio).—A magnificent picture which tells the story of a countess imprisoned in a convent and rescued by a cavalier friend. In this picture is to be seen the most daring and picturesque photographic effects that have ever been seen in moving picture film.

ITALIAN CAVALRY RIDERS (Ambrosio).—This is the original and much talked of film of the remarkable evolutions of the crack cavalry riders of Italy. The thrilling scenes where the horses charge up and down almost perpendicular sliffs, throwing the riders over their heads, are so realistic that the audience is held spellbound.

MOTHER'S PROTECTION.—A little girl is ill-treated by her step-mother. When the father leaves home on a supposed trip everything appears to be peace in the family. As soon as he is gone the step-mother ill-treats the child and at last locks her in a room. The child opens the window and escapes. The first duty of the little girl is to visit the grave of her mother, where she sees a vision of her parent. In the meantime the step-mother goes to the postoffice, where she finds a letter from her lover, appointing a rendezvous. As the step-mother leaves the postoffice we see the little girl following her. The lady on her way tears the letter and drops the pieces on the road, while the child still following picks up the scraps of paper. Back in her locked room, the child pastes the letter together and hides same under the carpet. As the father returns, he questions his child and she shows him the letter. The ending is painful with the father in distress, the expulsion of the wife step-mother and the father taking his child to the cemetery to visit again the grave of the real mother.

MY MOTHER-IN-LAW IS TOO KIND-HEARTED.—A good comic of the Eclair Company which should amuse an audience. This is not the proverbial mother-in-law always finding fault with her son-in-law, but it is a too kind-hearted woman, who having secured a rich son-in-law wishes to cultivate her charitable dispositions by bringing in all the poor fellows she meets in the streets to the house of her very indulgent son-in-law. The first one is a poor little boy who as soon as he reaches the dining room, he does not want a chair but sits on the table and helps himself to every edible in sight. Then a worthless tramp is taken to the house, a homeless dog is also made a member of the family. Now the mother-in-law meets a cripple on his little wagon, she wants to make him comfortable, she helps him home but as she reaches home as her son-in-law and his wife are going to bed, she forces them to sleep on the floor, while she gives the bed to the cripple. The next day the dear mother-in-law finds a whole starving family composed of the father, mother and a lot of children. She brings them all to the house, but as this proves too much for the indulgent son-in-law, he expels every one, even his dear mother-in-law.

FARMER JONES GOES TO THE MARKET (Hepwix).—Farmer Jones and wife go to market. When Jones buys some chickens, some of them escape as the wife tries to put them in the wagon, but the greatest trouble is when Jones buys a little pig. They start home but they did not count on the mischievous boys who manage to release the pig and assist in numerous chases until the pig is captured. The film is very amusing and will please the young folks especially.

REMOVAL UNDER DIFFICULTIES (Lux).—A family has decided to move. Everything is working very nicely, everyone is busy packing and moving the furniture and even the movers seem to put some zeal in their work. But no one had discounted the orders of the working unions. As the movers are packing the furniture on the wagon, an order is received that a strike is in effect and the men are ordered out. The tenant decides that he will have to do his own moving and he calls for a wagon, but as he starts to load same some walking delegates appear and stop him. The tenant and his family are at a loss, but in waiting a better turn of affairs they keep their furniture on the sidewalk and enjoy a lunch in the open air. They cannot even eat in peace as the police object to the blocking of the sidewalk and the officers throw pell mell in the wagon tenants and furniture and take them to the station house.

RUNNING AFTER A HELMET.—A comic from the Eclair Company. Two French firemen on leave of absence are taking a walk. As they reach a certain house one of them decides to visit a cook friend. As the cook loads him with provisions, including wine, the fireman does not know how to take them down when he thinks of his helmet. Placing the edibles in his helmet, he lowers same by means of a rope to his waiting friend, but before the friend can reach for the provisions, the helmet strikes the head of a passerby. The gentleman is greatly offended; taking the helmet he runs upstairs to investigate. The cook manages to hide the fireman and when the gentleman appears she declares that she had no company and never helped lower the helmet, but the gentleman on going to the window finds the rope. The gentleman takes the helmet to his dining room and hides the same in a dresser. As the fireman does not dare to return to the barracks minus his helmet, helped by his friend he reaches the window of the dining room and he succeeds to locate the helmet, but before he can reach same he is scared away and has just time to make good his escape. The gentleman not knowing what to do with the helmet decides to send same to the fire department and calling a servant he places the helmet in a basket and sends her on her errand. While on her way she meets the two firemen, but they fail to secure the helmet. As the girl deposits the helmet on the desk of the fire officer, the officer sends for one of the firemen, but as he has his helmet he is declared innocent. When the second fireman appears, minus his helmet, the officer goes for him but while the officer writes a few lines, the servant, having remorse of conscience, quickly places the helmet on the head of the fireman and when the officer gazes at him he cannot find him guilty.

THE DRAGOONS UNDER LOUIS XIV (Eclair).—The dragoons are in service in the village after an expedition in the Cevennes. One of the dragoons, an habitual drunkard, is quartered at the house of a young flower girl, who is living with her father, in an isolated house. The young girl is beautiful. The dragoon forces her to serve him a drink. The girl repulses the drunkard. The soldiers depart, leaving their comrade fighting with the girl. The girl, who is defended by her father, locks herself in her room. The dragoon consoles himself in exploring the place and, finding a bowl, he drinks and falls to the ground as dead.

The officer, who needs the services of the dragoon, sends some of his comrades to look for him. The messenger finds him inanimated; he calls for the other soldiers. No doubt that the girl gave poison to the dragoon to get rid of him. She is taken before the officer. She is tried at once, convicted of murder and, as an example, the judges sentence her to be burned at the stake.

The young girl is taken from the prison to the public execution place. The stake is ready, the young girl is fastened to it, the executioners paying no attention to the cries of the girl and to the supplications of her father. The torch is applied.

In the meantime, the drunkard, forgotten in the house, slowly comes back to his senses. He gets up, and half stumbling, he walks out. The clamors he hears guide him to the public place. He runs and sees his supposed murderess fastened to the stake. Luckily the fire has not yet done its work and the dragoon can prove what a terrible mistake the officer is making. The young girl is quickly released from the stake and falls in the arms of her father, while the dragoons are sadly impressed by their blunder.

CENTAUR FILM COMPANY.

THE COWBOY'S SWEETHEART.—For their first offering to the moving picture public the Centaur Company have wisely chosen a subject which, while being easily understood by the people, is also likely to be generally popular. In this they show great wisdom, for, as recent experience has demonstrated, it is an easy thing to produce pictures which, while full of highly technical and dramatic qualities, are yet above the heads of those who look at them. In other words, they lack the power of attracting and holding popular attention. The theme of this film is, after all, a simple one. It shows how course of true love between the cowboy and his sweetheart does not run smoothly. Villainy interposes, the usual obstacle, and for a time it looks as if the lovers were to be eternally parted, especially at the crucial moment of the play, when the villainousous outlaws secure and bind the hero and suspend him in a treacherous quicksand in which he is soon in process of being engulfed. But now the heroine appears and hangs onto the rope and so prevents her lover from being drawn under the sand. From this perilous position he is rescued by the loyal cowboys, and finally the lovers are united outside the door of the humble cabin, which is the scene of the opening of the little drama. The story, of which we have given the main theme, is full of incident, movement and action. In these respects, if the Centaur Company continue as they have commenced, they will deserve well of moving picture patrons, who, above all things, need, as has been pointed out recently in these pages, action, action, action all the time. The picturesque side of cowboy life in the field is shown, and there are many exciting pursuits, contests, adventures, both on horseback and a-foot, so that the picture has considerable variety of effect. The whole film is, in fact, crowded with incidents which spring naturally one from the other, another respect in which the Centaur Company show great dramatic acumen. It is too often the case that in a moving picture film an incident is, as it were, dragged in by the "head and ears."

The indoor and outdoor scenes have been well chosen. The costumes fit the piece, the actors have been well rehearsed in their movements, both on horseback and on foot, and the result is a very effective bit of cowboy life and adventure such as we think will be well received wherever it is shown.

Photographically regarded the picture must be given high praise. The Centaur Company seem determined to arrive at the best results in this important respect. Its length is 870 feet and it is to be released on May 8.

THE BANDITS

(ITALA-FILM)

A very thrilling dramatic comedy, beautifully toned and tinted; portraying a burlesque on the foreign police system, the forerunners of the Alphonse and Gaston type. Relishable, because excellent in treatment, photographically superb and dramatically beyond criticism. The technique of this picture is a standard in its class.

INTERNATIONAL PROJECTING AND PRODUCING CO.

"The independent film renter is scouting like mad for second-hand films. This is proof enough that the average independent does not intend to become a regular purchaser of the regular weekly output of the independent manufacturer, but intends to buy only when it suits him. This tendency in itself means failure for any concerted independent movement, and the Moving Picture Patents Company knows this and therefore they can afford to smile at the grandiloquent promises made by the Independents and the fierce threats made against the Trust. The simple, solid truth is that the vast number of exchanges that claim to be independent are running on the mangiest of junk and the outcry of their subscribers is painful. Already the business of many independent shows has been ruined and some of them are closing their doors."

The above paragraph appeared in the Moving Picture World on page 361, issue of March 27, 1909, under the caption of "Observations by Our Man About Town," and is the cause of our publishing the above offer. This paragraph was probably published with a view of ridiculing the INDEPENDENT movement and INDEPENDENT exchange. As this article has appeared, we wish to say, as America's Largest Film Exchange, either TRUST or INDEPENDENT, that the facts published are, in the main, true. There are many small wild-cat exchanges representing themselves as being Independent which are really the back door of some TRUST film exchange who are endeavoring to make their "junk" film earn them something.

In securing INDEPENDENT service, Mr. Exhibitor, you want to be sure that you are dealing with an exchange that is INDEPENDENT and buying INDEPENDENT film, and not endeavoring to palm off on you their old Trust "junk" film.

As the best proof of our ability to handle your account with new Independent films and to prove our responsibility to you, we refer you to

I, Carl Laemmle, the biggest and best film renter in all the world now ask for your patronage. Not on any sentimental grounds, but because I can and will give you the grandest film service on earth. The Independent Films are a tremendous, a sensational, an exciting success. My success will not turn my head. I give you my word you will get the same painstaking care, the same high class quality as though you were just starting in the game, ambitious to succeed. JONES AND THE LADY BOOK AGENT

You may rest assured that our genial friend Edward Everett Jones gets into trouble again. This time it looked serious, but as usual he wriggles out. He is visited at his office by a lady book agent and on account of the reception given her she plans vengeance by putting her old pair of corsets in a box containing gloves, which Jones has bought for his wife. There are things doing in the Jones family, until a penitential letter is received from the book agent which explains everything. Length, 585 feet.

THE FRENCH DUEL

This is a very funny high class burlesque, and different from anything ever before attempted. It shows a party of Frenchmen at a club and one resents the putting of an olive in his cocktail. They meet on the field of honor, where a duel to the death is imminent. They are attended by a corps of trained nurses and undertakers, who are not called into service as it is a bloodless though funny contest. Length, 407 feet.

RELEASED MAY 13, 1909

A BABY'S SHOE

Beautiful life story of a long separated brother and sister.

This is unquestionably the most beautiful motion picture story ever portrayed, dealing as it does with a subject of the most profound nature. The atmosphere is that of sanctity and there is not a harsh or discordant note in its entire length. Beautifully yet consistently staged, convincingly acted, and handled with a delicacy seldom if ever equalled in picture productions it becomes the very acme of art. This is emphasized by superb photography. The story tells of a widowed mother of two children, a boy and baby girl who is forced by poverty to leave the baby on the doorsteps of a wealthy banker. The poor woman takes off one of the baby's shoes before leaving it, and returning home dies clutching the tiny memento in her hand. The parish priest takes the boy as well as the little shoe. Fifteen years later the girl grown into womanhood imagines the banker and his wife her parents, while the boy is preparing for Holy Order, both ignorant of each other's existence. A runaway in the park is stopped by the boy and a friendship of the girl, who was the victim of the runaway, and her rescuer, ripens into love. They are about to be married when the revelation is made, through the little shoe, they are brother and sister. The girl becomes a nun, while the boy becomes a priest, finding "The Peace that passest all understanding." Length, 999 feet.

GEORGE KLEINE

Licensed by Motion Picture Patents Co.

"AN UNEVEN KEEL"

Drama. Approximate Length, 703 Feet.

RELEASE, TUESDAY, MAY 11, 1909.

Mother and daughter hurry to the dock to greet the father on his return from a long voyage. Many shouts of joy and greeting are heard on all about but the father does not appear.

They enter the boat and the captain breaks to them the news of the father's death at sea. Without money they are in great despair.

Donning the father's clothes the young girl endeavors to secure the position of cabin boy. She is successful and secures part of the pay before starting. She hurries home to her mother with the money, keeping a trifle to pay for a round of drinks out of courtesy to the sailor aiding her to secure the position. Her sex is unknown and all are having a good time, in fact, too good a time, when the police interfere and the cabin boy is injured in the scramble to evade the law. His companion carries him home, and there the removal of the cap discloses his long hair, while the mother's exclamation of fear for her daughter makes known the girl's identity, to the embarrassment of the new friends.

The sailor becomes a steady caller and the two are soon united in marriage and thereafter the mother makes her home with them.

Editorial.

Certain of the manufacturers have pointed out to us that there is a sharp line of distinction to be drawn between the Motion Picture Patents Company and the Associated manufacturers. The company exists as a patent holding concern on the one hand, whilst the manufacturers are merely individual licensees of that company. They do not hold stock in the Patents Company, they have no voice in its management, and their license agreement only exists for one year, being terminable at the expiration of that period.

Consequently it will be seen that some confusion has arisen in the public mind as to the exact position of the various interests. Of course the common impression is that the manufacturers are banded together for the purpose of exploiting a trust, whereas such is not the case. All the manufacturers are waiting for, we understand, is that their recognition of the Motion Picture Patents Company should be publicly vindicated. The effect of this would be that the Associated manufacturers would be in a position to double their output, so that they would reap some direct advantage from their affiliation with the Motion Picture Patents Company. At present the only advantage they have received is the privilege of contributing to the company's coffers. They not unreasonably demand something in return for this.

Moreover, while approving of the "uplift" policy of which so much has been made by those responsible for it, certain manufacturers also complain that so far they have not reaped any advantage therefrom. Of course it may be urged that this is somewhat early for complaints to be made, but it is indicative of dissatisfaction with the course of events. The progress of the threatened suits will be watched with interest. It seems clear, however, that the output of the Associated manufacturers could be materially increased, and that they are only waiting a suitable opportunity for it to be done.

About Ourselves.

Our contemporary, the Dramatic Mirror, is featuring an addition to its staff, who, over the signature of "The Spectator," is treating of film subjects. Half of his space in the current issue of the Mirror is devoted to a criticism of our recent editorial headed "Quality." The Mirror man claims for his paper a year's priority in having pointed out the need of improvement in the quality of films. Piffle! Exactly two years ago, namely, on May 11, 1907, we drew attention to the depression of "the moving picture business which would surely follow if misguided manufacturers and dealers persisted in issuing subjects bordering on the sensational and immoral." No single number of The Moving Picture World has since been issued which has not had for its object the technical and dramatic improvement of moving picture films. "Spectator's" claim for the Mirror's priority therefore falls to the ground. Moreover The Moving Picture World has the services of dramatic critics with as much experience as any of the critics employed by our Forty-second street contemporary. At all points of the game, therefore, we deny either the right or the ability of our contemporary to call us down. The remainder of "Spectator's" article demonstrates his facility in writing journalistic platitudes, but we search in vain for some evidence that he knows anything about the technicalities of film making. The New York Dramatic Mirror is an old and well-esteemed theatrical paper, with which we are sorry to have to break a lance. Its dramatic criticisms of films are helpful, but the sooner it gives up the hopeless task of posing as an authority on the entire subject, the better, we think, it will be for its reputation for common sense. The interests of moving pictures in the press can only be adequately defended by a combination of practical, technical and critical qualifications, such as The Moving Picture World alone enjoys. Esteemed contemporaries, please note.

In the history of modern amusements no fact is more startling than the growth in popular esteem of the moving picture. Its popularity is due to the fact that the public mind has been educated up to reject mediocrity, incompetency and sheer incapacity on the dramatic and vaudeville stages. People, indeed, prefer the high class "mechanical" act to the senseless puerilities of untrained "actors" and "actresses." The establishment of a moving picture press was, therefore, the logical outcome of events. What followed? The theatrical papers, without exception, for a long time absolutely ignored the moving picture as a factor in the entertainment situation. They devoted no space to it, although they cheerfully accepted the advertisements of the manufacturers. Nowadays, however, they clamor to patronize that industry which they formerly ignored, and reap kudos and profit thereby. Whatever gains they make in this direction can be directly traced to the initiative of The Moving Picture World. This fact admits of no dispute. We repeat that it was not until The Moving Picture World drew attention to the enormous entertainment possibilities of the moving picture that the theatrical papers woke up to the fertility of the new field that had been prepared absolutely without their help, encouragement, support or knowledge. Now that they are reaping where others have sown, we take leave to doubt whether the combined patronage of all the theatrical papers of the United States is worth a red cent to the moving picture industry, wholly or in part. How about it, Mr. "Spectator?"

Owing to pressure on our space, we are compelled to hold over several feature articles, including the installment of Mr. Richardson's "Plain Talks to Operators and Managers." A double chapter will be given next week.

About Anniversaries.

A moving picture publication, in celebrating its first anniversary, says that it was formed to succeed The Moving Picture World. If it was, let us see how well it has succeeded in its self-imposed mission. Turning back to The Moving Picture World of May 2, 1908, the date when our "successor" seceded and when the World drew a deep breath of relief and really began to live, we find that our issue of that date consisted of a total of 24 pages, 9 of which were advertisements. Our issue of May 1, 1909, consisted of 40 pages, 20 of which were advertisements. This represents a total space increase of 66 per cent., and in advertising patronage an increase of about 75 per cent. Our subscription list has increased in proportion, until there is not an exhibitor of moving pictures or a concern engaged in their manufacture or distribution which does not look for the World every week, and if it happens to be a day late we are swamped with letters to hurry it along as they cannot do without it. In plain language, The Moving Picture World has more than doubled in value and public esteem since our "successor's" secession. Any comment of ours would spoil the irresistible cogency of these facts and the conclusions to be drawn therefrom.

The Question of Prices.

The development of the situation in the moving picture field has led to the expression of a serious fear in many quarters. That fear apprehends nothing more nor less than a war of prices. It is felt that this is the almost inevitable outcome of the division of the moving picture field into two opposing forces. And some of the smaller Independent manufacturers, as well as several exchange men, have expressed to us their regret that such a state of things should be likely to happen.

But we do not think it will. We have been in consultation with leading men on both the Associated side and the Independent side. Men of sound judgment and common sense business principles. They not only agree that the price cutting of films would be a disastrous element to be admitted into the business, but they are determined that it shall not. Moreover, there appears to be every prospect of an agreement being reached all round to maintain prices. So that the battle to be fought is one that we ourselves were the first to outline; namely, the battle of quality.

This is a contest in which, of course, no well respecting business man need fear to enter. We think this general disposition to keep up prices to a profitable level will be generally welcomed and we are glad to have this opportunity of making this announcement. Certainly at the first indication of price cutting from any source whatsoever, the most drastic steps should be taken to prevent the spread of the malady. In our opinion all the signs point to a very prosperous era in the moving picture field, and it is well, at this stage of affairs, that the threatened evil should be averted.

A Moving Picture Exhibition

A Suggestion for the Patents Company.

In London, next July, there is to take place an international "kinematographic," or moving picture, exhibition. The scene of the display will be in the Crystal Palace, a vast glass palace, situated some miles from the center of London and constituting one of the most popular and beautiful show places in the world. The intention of the promoters of this exhibition is to attract from all parts of the world, and here we quote from the official programme, "a representative display of projectors, films of all kinds, gramaphones, singing picture machines, synchronizers, film boxes and reels, arcs, burners, lenses, slides, lanterns, electric light fittings, screen frames, non-inflammable material of every sort," and, in fact, everything connected with the preparation and exhibition of the moving picture. The scheme of the exhibition is as comprehensive as it could be.

It seems to us that this is a very good opportunity for the American film manufacturer to be, for the first time, properly represented in England, to have his productions prominently brought before a large public which is waiting to purchase them. For, strange as it may seem, the American film is very little known in England, although there are agencies in London for its distribution, such as the Edison and Vitagraph Companies. But there is room for more. Stay-at-home Americans seldom realize how popular the best class of American productions are in England, provided they be understood. "That is all there is to it." The English public, like the American public, is very easily catered for; in fact, the two publics are very much alike; the paying public, we mean. Not the superior persons who constitute that small and negligible section of the community known as "society." We mean the people.

Now we suggest to the Patents Company that this is a ready-made opportunity for them to demonstrate their sincerity in wishing to help along the American moving picture industry. Let them take charge of the American section of what promises to be a very great international exhibition. Let them organize the exhibits, send them to London, arrange for their adequate public display, and thus, by bringing them prominently before the hundreds of thousands of visitors to this exhibition, they will help create a demand abroad for American made films.

Irrespective of this suggestion, however, the matter is one which is of general interest to the American film trade, and we hope, therefore, that it will attract the attention it deserves. We are promised full details of the prospectus of the exhibition, which we will publish on receipt.

Meanwhile we close this editorial with the address of the promoters of the exhibition, which is Messrs. Brown & Bernard, Ltd., Westinghouse Building, Norfolk street, Strand, London, W. C., England, with whom those of our readers who are interested should get into communication.

NOTES OF THE TRADE.

Mr. Selig advises us that the film to be issued from the Selig studio on May 20 will create a sensation among the trade. We are used to seeing big things emanate from this studio and Mr. Selig has always been very modest when speaking of their successes, therefore when he mentions beforehand that he has a surprise in store we can imagine the exchange men falling over each other in their haste to get in advance orders for extra copies.

The World Film Mfg. Co., of Portland, Ore., advise us that they are now prepared to market a regular weekly supply of American subjects. We look forward with much interest to seeing the first productions of this company, as we understand that their working force is composed of the very best talent that they could procure in this country as well as from Europe. Their factory is equipped with the most approved machinery and some of their employees have been with the largest film manufacturing concerns in the world. During our last interview with Mr. Lewis H. Moomaw, the general manager of the World Film Manufacturing Co., he said that his company was prepared to spend any amount of money required to equip a perfect plant and turn out film that was the equal of any and excelled by none. Until this ambition was realized to their satisfaction no films would be issued. Now that they announce their first releases we look forward with some degree of confidence to the results of their many months of silence.

The Modern Way in Moving Picture Making.

By Thomas Bedding, F. R. P. S.

CHAPTER IX.

Whilst the last number of The Moving Picture World was passing through the press, I saw in New York City a number of recently released films which contained many of the defects described in the previous chapter, and which the makers of those prints, had they possessed the necessary knowledge, could have prevented. There seemed last week to be quite an epidemic of spots and other defects in the pictures, which was very noticeable, coming, as it did, after several weeks of very high technical excellence; evidently, then, these chapters are not being written in vain.

To take up the thread of the subject as dropped last week; we come to the handling of the negative after it is washed and dried. It is then by no means ready for printing, although it is too often the practice to put it into use straight away.

In the first place it should be carefully examined for any defects it may contain, as previously mentioned, and, if possible, those defects should be removed or remedied. Take off the superfluous dust markings with a very sharp knife or by gentle friction treatment. Absorbent cotton moistened in kerosene is well recognized as a good cleaning agent. Not only should the film side of the picture be cleaned, but also the plain side. A common practice is to wind the negative on a suitable winder and then to rewind it on another winder, both being fixed on a work bench. This allows of the negative being easily examined and cleaned in its progress from one winder to the other.

The negative must not only be cleaned, but critically examined with a view to the suppression or elimination of superfluous parts of the film. There may be too much of a particular episode in the picture or an uninteresting patch, or a section showing no action, or it may be desired for some reason or another to shorten the film either at the beginning or at the end. The superfluous piece of the film must be cut off or cut out, and the ends then neatly joined up, so that the pictures follow in their proper sequence. This matter of film economics does not receive so much attention as it deserves. It is quite a nice point of judgment as to the exact amount of subject to be left in the film. Very often the success of the picture will depend on the inclusion of a greater or less amount of the narrative action. Therefore the man who examined the film after it is made, should, besides his technical knowledge, have some sense of proportion; a nice appreciation of the author's and producer's intention in the making of the film.

Incidentally the question of waste crops up. If the negative is too long, then the positive is too long, so there will be a double waste. The quantity of film that is wasted in this manner in some moving picture houses is very great, so great, that special means should be taken to prevent it. This can only be done by the careful co-operation of all concerned. If the production is closely worked out, then there need not be any waste in the negative.

A common defect seen in positives is unevenness of deposit; one part of the picture is darker than the other. This may be due to inaccuracy in exposure or development. Very often, however, it is due to an entirely different cause. This is simply the joining up of unexposed parts of negative film and using this patch work film in the camera. What is the result? You probably have in the one length of film several degrees of sensitiveness and so in development you get different degrees of density which are reproduced in the positive with the results seen on the screen. This is somewhat doubtful economy. Or maybe pieces of positive film are used in this manner. The result will be the same unevenness in the picture with dissatisfaction on the part of the exhibitor and his audiences.

It cannot be too strongly emphasized again that no two batches of film are of exactly the same sensitiveness. Exposure and development is therefore to be carefully watched so as to adjust them to the exact requirements of the film. The negative being ready for printing, every care must be taken in this latter operation. Whatever form of printer may be employed, it is imperative that the omnipresent enemy—dust—be guarded against. The positive film should be stored in a cool, dry, clean room, and it should be handled with the utmost cleanliness. These remarks also apply to the perforation of the film. The perforator should be kept free of dust, grease, and every precaution should be taken to free the surface of the film from the minute particles of celluloid which are distributed by the action of the perforator. At the risk of wearying the reader by harping too much on one string, I must again state that the greatest foe to perfection of result in moving picture making is dust or dirt, dust or dirt, dust or dirt; in short, matter in the wrong place. And no time or effort is wasted on the part of the employees of a moving picture plant in specially guarding against its presence in the factory.

The printing of the negative, of course, is in theory a simple matter. Positive film is brought into contact with the negative and the exposure of each picture is made for a definite length of time to a light of definite actinic strength, fixed at a definite distance from the surface of the negative. So you see it is an exceedingly simple matter to standardize these factors, provided, of course, that the density of the negative is known and also the rapidity of the positive film. The simplest way of arriving at the two latter factors is, of course, to make a test of the negative on the positive. Positive film does not vary in sensitiveness. It has a slower emulsion, and as every photographer knows, slow emulsions are easier to work with than the more rapid kinds, consequently printing is compartively an easy matter. All that is required on the part of the printer is care and intelligence of judgment. The employee responsible for the development of the positive can easily satisfy himself as to the developable properties of positive film by making one or two experiments on the lines indicated. Of course all negatives should be of uniform density. As a rule they are not; some are quick, some are slow, some are contrasty or thin or flat, etc. An allowance can be made for all these variations.

Of course this is somewhat unscientific and vague. I would like to see all negatives uniform, as they should in theory be. Then printing, exposure and development would also be uniform and automatic. We shall probably reach this stage in moving picture making, but the time is not yet.

I hope this chapter will be instrumental in drawing attention to the fact that between the development of a negative and its printing much generally remains to be done before the negative is ready for the latter operation.

ANOTHER FILM D'ART

Will be issued by Pathe Freres on the 12th. It is "The Hunter's Grief," a powerful story, the characters of which are acted by prominent Parisian artists such as M. Masnier, of the Theater Renaissance; M. Chelles and Mlle. Taillade, of l'Odeon. The splendid scenic effects are in keeping with the work of the talented actors.

MOTION PICTURE PATENTS COMPANY.

THEIR POLICY AND PROCEDURE.

There was a disposition on the part of the exhibitors to raise a howl when the license fee was first imposed and many of them thought that it was only a scheme to fatten the pocketbooks of a few holders of patents of questionable validity. It seems, however, that the money is not being diverted into private channels, but is being used in various ways that is making for the welfare of the exhibitor and the good of the general business. The necessity for such missionary work is apparent to any thinking man, and if we can judge from the tone of our correspondence and the reports that the number of licensed exhibitors is steadily increasing, it would seem that the exhibitor is making up his mind that the work undertaken by the Motion Picture Patents Company is worthy of support.

In a letter from the manager of the Avenue Theater, of East St. Louis, he says:

"I read with regret in some of the papers that there is so much animosity against the motion Picture Patents Company, of which organization I think that there cannot be enough said in their favor, as they are doing a great work in fighting the adversaries of moving pictures in the various States. Still there are a lot of people that think they are getting held up because they are asked to put up $2 a week for the protection of their own interests. They should realize that there are a lot of expenses connected with this missionary work, which is not a thing to be taken lightly, but really means the saving of a business which is the means of livelihood of many who have invested their all in it.

"Anyone trying to figure out that the so-called Independent forces is organized for purely unselfish motives should study their methods and they will think differently. The Independent films are not the kind that create or maintain business. I know what I am talking about, as I have opposition houses that have tried it and failed and have gone back to the films of the licensed manufacturers faster than they left them.

AN AVERTED CATASTROPHE.

Legislative bodies, like ordinary individuals, are not fool proof. The fool is like the poor, always with us. He becomes a menace to public concord when, dressed in a little brief authority, he is allowed to wreak his irrational experiments on an unoffending community. A new bill making the use of celluloid film a misdemeanor, unless it has been previously "fire proofed," was proposed by Senator Cullen and rushed through the New York State Senate on Wednesday, April 28. The bill was handed down to the Legislature on Friday, April 30. The passage of this measure, signed by the Governor, would have brought the moving picture business to a standstill in the absence of any known process of safely "fire proofing" films, or even in the case of such a process being readily available. Fortunately this absurd bill attracted the attention of the Motion Picture Patents Company, whose representative, Mr. Chester Beecroft, blocked the passage of the bill on the ground that the proposed legislation was premature and unjust. The bill, therefore, was recommitted before the adjournment of the Legislature. In defeating this ridiculous bill the Patents Company and Mr. Beecroft are deserving of congratulations at the hands of the entire moving picture industry.

NAVAL DEPARTMENT LICENSED TO PRODUCE PICTURES.

The Motion Picture Patents Company has granted a license to the Navy, through Lieut. Com. G. H. Holden, for the taking of pictures and the projecting of same, provided that such pictures shall not be sold or otherwise disposed of by the Navy or used for public exhibitions.

NEW YORK M. P. HOUSES TO BE OPENED ON SUNDAYS.

Judge Carr, of the Supreme Court, in Brooklyn, N. Y., has handed down a decision that will prove of great interest to owners of moving picture theaters. The decision establishes that a moving picture show can be lawfully operated on Sundays, and that licenses, if issued at all, must be issued without restrictions. Judge Carr, in rendering the decision, "Most of the moving picture shows are classified as dramatic performances, verging from their most common form of farce comedies to the gruesome tragedy. This much has been held by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals under the copyright law in Harper Brothers vs. the Kalem Company (New York Law Journal, April 13, 1909).

"Of course there may be and doubtless are moving picture shows which do not constitute dramatic representation; but in any event the Penal Laws of this State should not be so construed as to discriminate between different forms of the same kind of public entertainment, for apart from the statute one is as innocent as the other. A person should have such legal right to give a public dramatic performance on a Sunday with living speaking personages as actors as another has to employ for the same purposes either lay figures or photographic reproductions.

"In the granting of a license the Mayor is vested with a proper discretion with which the courts should not interfere. This discretion, however, excludes the idea of the exercise of the power in such manner as to be arbitrary. Wherever such discretion is exercised arbitrarily, the courts will interfere for the benefit of those seeking licenses. The issuance of a license in this case imports that both the plaintiff and his place of business satisfy the requirements of law. The Mayor, however, thinks that the plaintiff's business should not be conducted on Sundays. To the extent wherein the business may be unlawful, the Mayor is right. To the extent in which it may be lawful the Mayor should not interfere by the exercise of arbitrary power. The things which cannot be done lawfully on a Sunday are all enumerated in the Penal Code of this State. It is not for any power other than the Legislature either to enlarge or restrict the scope of this law.

"There are nearly a dozen similar applications for injunctions now before this court, and which are decided herewith."

WEEKLY COMMENTS ON THE SHOWS.

By Our Own Critic.

The conversion of a theater of the usual kind into a moving picture house, is an event of first rate importance in connection with the spread of the silent stage in New York City. It has recently been announced that the progressive house of Keith & Proctor have given over their 125th street place of amusement to the newest form of entertainment, displacing from the boards the human performer, who fails to draw the remunerative patronage of the public. Feeling like this, I considered it my duty to the readers of this paper to visit the newest moving picture house and report thereon.

It certainly is a beautiful and stately place, and a visitor thereto will have the opportunity of enjoying moving pictures amid such surroundings as I have described last week, namely, those of comfort, luxury and convenience. The house has a seating capacity of 1,800. It is beautifully kept and appointed, and though the Summer season has set in, and attendance at all forms of indoor entertainment are bound for the time being to diminish, yet it is easy to see that the new Keith & Proctor house is assured of a large slice of local patronage. On the occasion of my visit a gentleman in kilts, the Scot's national dress, sang one of Mr. Harry Lauder's songs very well indeed. It might surprise the American readers how little the kilt is worn in Scotland. This gentleman sang very well and he was applauded, but there was a feeling in the house that he stood in the way of the pictures, which were what the people wanted to see. As a matter of fact, people go to moving picture houses to have the brain ministered to through the eye, and not the ear. They do not go to listen to sings, or vaudeville acts, or anything of the kind; they go to see the pictures. The accompanying instrumental music is, or should be, chosen simply to heighten or emphasize the effect of the dramatic action shown on the screen. This latter condition was this week carried out in a very splendid manner by the music which accompanied or illustrated a very fine Selig film of "Chinatown Slavery," about which the film world is talking so approvingly just now. The result of this was a further confirmation in my mind, if such were needed, that the moving picture is what people want, and I do hope that such intelligent amusement caterers as Keith & Proctor will not take it amiss if I emphasize this fact. Harlem apparently abounds in five-cent combined vaudeville shows which do not appear to be very prosperous. The condition of this, I am convinced, brought about the fact that they are not offering the public the right kind of goods, and that is, good pictures well done. This may be a somewhat difficult lesson, but the moving picture theater proprietor who learns it thoroughly and well will profit in the long run. The new Keith & Proctor house is a welcomed addition to New York moving picture theaters. Now, Keith & Proctor, when are you going to specially build a high class moving picture theater with all the latest improvements and appointments? New York is waiting for it.

OBSERVATIONS BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

Trade conditions in the metropolitan zone are rapidly assuming the shape of a full-fledged circus in Winter quarters, so far as the moving picture business is concerned. I never, in all my several years of experience in that business, saw a more pronounced disposition to inactivity and take-things-as-they-come than at the present time. The situation is a puzzling one. For almost two weeks past (it may have escaped observation for a longer period) there has been a surprising absence of that hustle and bustle, that enterprising spirit which has heretofore characterized the movements of the business. In explanation of the situation some say the approach of the Summer season is responsible. Exhibitors who have been obliged to pay exorbitant rents for places and succeeded in dodging an all-year lease are gradually worming their way out of the city and seeking locations near the sad sea waves, or on the bank of some babbling brook. A well-informed traveler reports that many Summer resorts that heretofore looked upon moving picture shows very much in the light of a circus will consider them as quite commonplace. Many exhibitors are preparing to leave the cities and larger towns for the seaside and mountains. They figure upon being able to maintain their families at the resorts upon the net receipts and any surplus will be looked upon as "velvet." This is going to open a new field of competition in the exhibition line. Heretofore the camp meetings and Summer amusement places have furnished the pictures at the cheapest possible price—to the management. It looks very much like a big change this Summer. The nickelodeon man who knows his city and town place can be run during the Summer months at best on a basis meeting expenses is disposed to seek Summer quarters on the same basis. To keep his family at some resort during the Summer is an extra drain upon his purse. It is evidently the intention of many to make the pictures do the work this Summer and we may look for sharp competition between the nickelodeon man under a tent and the old-time camp meeting entertainment committee. Of course, the result of this campaign will depend in a great measure upon the location, local influence, and one or two other minor considerations. One thing is certain, wherever the nickelodeon man gets a stand and decides to spend the Summer months the other fellows will be obliged to pay for pictures a figure approaching nearer the mark of fair remuneration than they have in the past.

I do not wish to appear irreverent, or desirous of casting reflections with an ulterior motive, but I must say that the managements of the entertainment courses at most of the Summer religious gatherings are most niggardly. It is an undisputed fact that in recent years higher priced attractions have been dispensed with to make room for the moving pictures, which have filled the bill as well, so far as money-drawing power is concerned, and at far less expense than would be entailed by the booking of the discarded features. In spite of this drawing power, the managements have year after year steadily pounded down the contract price for the pictures until to-day the exhibitor gets out of the show practically nothing above expenses. When large auditoriums are filled by audiences drawn by the pictures at far less expense than the committees would be able to secure the platform, orchestral and other musical attractions it would seem that these committees should be willing to part with at least some of the extra gain in favor of the picture men. But they don't. The nickelodeon men who can get in line this Summer and give the people of the resorts a show that will bring the tight-laced, seal-wadded amusement purveyors to their senses will be entitled to the heartiest thanks of the regulars. This will put an end to "rain storms" at ten cents per head and make those who are really making money out of the pictures scout for a better grade of stuff—and pay for it. Most of the camp meeting picture shows are jokes and so disgust the people that patronize them "for the good of the cause" that when they return from the resorts they taboo the home enterprises and it takes weeks for the managements to restore confidence. It is a pity that the exhibitors of the country are not organized so that they might regulate this affair.

A number of picture places in Greater New York are steadily falling by the wayside. The approaching close of the regular amusement season is by no means the cause. The building and fire departments are most exacting. The rules applying to places located in tenement houses are being enforced with special vigor. This has worked a hardship to many who have gone to great expenses in fitting up places and putting them in condition to conform with the requirements of the various departments. At the same time a good many people who were in the game solely for the coin have very justly been driven back to their peanut and lemonade stands.

What a conundrum a Legislature is. It is like a flea. You never know where it is. There were bills upon bills before the high-brows at Albany all Winter affecting the moving picture business and they adjourned without passing or rejecting any of them. Much valuable time was wasted upon several of the bills, but Governor Hughes' whiskers seemed to be the paramount issue. It has been stated several times that had some of the bills been backed with a little more "legal tender" they might have been passed or defeated, according to the occasion. However, nothing was done and nobody appears to be satisfied. At the next session the Coney Island five-cent fare bill and the moving pictures will come up again and the high-brows will be again asking "Who's who?"

The Motion Picture Patents Company has inaugurated the system of holding the film renting exchanges responsible for payment of two dollars per week for each exhibitor supplied with films. It went into effect last Monday. The indications at present are quite favorable to the movement. No complaints have thus far been heard from the exchanges and the exhibitors are passive. The latter say the change is immaterial to them, as they are obliged to put up the license fee and it is as convenient for them to pay Peter as it is to feed Paul. The exchanges heard from thus far endorse the new system.

I have before me a stack of letters containing all sorts of questions and criticisms regarding the Motion Picture Patents Company. To answer them individually would be a herculean task. I have succeeded in dividing them so that two answers will cover them all. A minor percentage of the letters bear upon the tardiness of the Patents Company in making good its promise of two or three months ago to jump upon the non-believers in its claims and policies, and asking why the company has not made good. As to this I can only say that the Patents Company is the best qualified to make answer. The majority of the letters ask if it is true that the Patents Company is about to begin suits against those who have ignored or repudiated its claims. As to this I will say that no official announcement of that nature has been made, but during the past ten days rumors to that effect have gained circulation with such a strong color of authenticity that many close observers are inclined to give them some degree of credit.

A few of the letters received come at me so direct for an expression of personal opinion regarding the situation that I am obliged to make answer, so here goes: Taking everything into consideration, the Patents Company is in about the same position as that held by the prize fighter, Jim Jeffries, who says that when he is satisfied he can get into condition to win he is going after Jack Johnson. That lets me out.

OLIVER

MIXED VAUDEVILLE A MENACE TO THE M. P. SHOWS.

Mr. William H. Swanson writes that he is very much in favor of the expressions published in the Moving Picture World in regard to the advisability of excluding vaudeville from the picture theaters. He says:

"Chicago has nearly five hundred theaters of all kinds and grades, and over two hundred of these places are for sale for the mere guaranteeing of the lease, all having been brought about by the adoption of vaudeville. This will naturally lead to the installing and building of the larger theaters, who in turn put on much more vaudeville than the small nickel theater, the larger house charging ten cents. A single large theater with a seating capacity of from seven hundred to a thousand, put completely out of business not less than five surrounding smaller houses seating two or three hundred. Capacity is what makes this possible, and the necessity for capacity was brought about by the introduction of vaudeville."

A convincing argument in favor of the views expressed by Mr. Swanson and other experienced showmen is that, last week, a show house on Fourteenth street, New York, that was giving a vaudeville and picture show for ten cents, and which price they reduced a few weeks ago to five cents, has closed its doors. On the same block a straight picture show still flourishes and one short black away is Keith's Bijou Dream which is daily crowding its large seating capacity with a show of latest pictures, two songs and a short lecturette.

A Talk on System.

By J. J. Murdock,
President of the International Projecting and Producing Co.

"There is one thing in this film business," said Mr. Murdock, President of the International Projecting and Producing Company, in an interview with the Western representative of this paper, "that should deserve more attention, and that is the employment of a system. An up-to-date and up-to-the-minute working system is an essential factor in the conducting of any large business, but particularly indispensable in the successful management of a film exchange. A large film exchange has hundreds of reels coming and going from and to every part of the country. New customers are getting on, old one dropping off, correspondence is pouring in all the time advising about booking, machine parts, complaints, inquiries, correspondence is going out replying, soliciting, collecting, etc., and all these movements must be controlled by a system to save time and money. Of course everybody uses some kind of a system, but it is a moot point if in nine cases out of ten it couldn't be considerably improved. My impression is that both film exchanges and exhibitors more than once have their hands full of trouble on this account. The exhibitor is a very excited individual if something goes wrong with his service, especially the out of town man who does booking by mail. The booking department of the film exchange is quite a problem in itself. Reels sometimes get a notion in their heads and go astray, and Lord knows where they are—the exchange don't, anyway. Then there is a maze of accounts—people that pay and people that don't pay, and people that pay some and people that promise to pay some, new accounts and old standing ones to be collected. Mistakes are liable to happen, with great annoyance and commercial loss. By employing a minute working system evils of this kind could be practically eliminated.

"For a large concern like ours," said Mr. Murdock, "a perfect system is indispensable—we must have the very best. I recognized that fact from the very beginning and employed the best authorities in the country to that effect. We had the expert from Sears & Robuck Company down here—a twenty-five thousand-dollar man—he and two others working for three weeks on our books and filing system. I claim it is perfect, and it goes into every detail of our large business. We have all our films sampled, graded and registered. We can tell by request its character, photography, tinting, length, release date, special characteristics and its grade in value for exhibition. For a manufacturer that issues one reel a week it might be an easy matter, but we represent twenty-seven and our shipments come in millions of feet from different countries.

"There is another thing I wish to emphasize, and that is that we pay for everything cash and we expect to conduct our business along the same lines. I think more harm is contracted by an easy running credit than any other menace to the business. Accounts accumulate and cause troubles and difficulties of all kinds. We would rather confine our business to certain proportions and deal with responsible people that pay for their goods than take any chances on questionable accounts. Many a film renter, even if he wants to pay his bills, is more or less of a gambler and takes his chances on doubtful customers and counts on bad accounts, thus buying more films to supply all these people. If then the exhibitor goes to the wall or can't produce the coin anyway the film renter does not get paid for his service and of course he can't pay for all the new films either—and then we all have to suffer. If everything was conducted along stricter lines and everybody not so loose with his credit we all could build up a more substantial business."

Mr. Murdock took us all around the new place—the International is now installed in their new comfortable headquarters on the seventh floor of the Schiller Building, where they occupy a magnificent suite of rooms. We took a peep at the new machine that has certainly got some very creditable features and demonstrated a steady and flickerless picture. We were piloted in the big film vault where hundreds of tin cans were waiting for marketing. We were informed that the bunch before us represented about one million feet—new stuff coming in all the time, and, most important of all, going out. On our inquiry about some of the more notable films of late, we were referred to "'The Italian Cavalry Ride,' as one of the finest and of international fame, but we have one here," said Mr. Murdock, "that is going to interest the American public still more, and that's 'President Roosevelt visits the ruins of Messina in company with the King and Queen of Italy'—not any fake pictures, but the real, genuine article taken on the grounds by Ambrosio."

"Well, Mr. Murdock, we cannot refrain from asking how about the much talk of 'one-third,' when you show us this big list of orders from Independent film exchanges."

"Well, we haven't got it yet, but we will, and that's all we want. We might easily be able to handle twice the amount of the business, but we couldn't do it with full justice to the American exhibitor. We are not in a cut-throat competition with the licensed manufacturers, as many people believe, and besides the Trust stated from the early beginning that they weren't going to supply every theater in the United States. If they were, look at the competition that would arise among the exhibitors themselves every show running the same picture! Take, for instance, two exhibitors in the same block, both getting the same kind of service; of course, it would kill the business for them both, and they would have to resort to all kinds of advertising schemes to draw the crowds from each other, but now if one is independent and one is licensed people will go to one show first and then to the other, and both are getting the benefit of the business. We are very much satisfied with the present conditions and we do believe that the trade now is realizing that things are on a far more sound basis than they ever have been before."

PATHE FRERES AND THE MOTION PICTURE PATENTS COMPANY.

An Important Interview with J. A. Berst.

We found Mr. Berst, the New York Manager of Messrs. Pathe, in excellent health after his recent European trip, which was mainly undertaken for purposes of pleasure, but still with many arrears of work to clear off that had accumulated in his absence. We were desirous of ascertaining from such a prominent figure in the American moving picture field what the business outlook of that field was. At present Mr. Berst assured us that things were rather better than they were a year ago shortly after the occurrence of the 1907 panic. It was too early, we gather from Mr. Berst, to learn how the business of Pathe Freres would be affected by recent changes in the moving picture field, but we learn that he is satisfied with the outlook.

Rumor having been exceedingly busy in associating Messrs. Pathe's name with an alleged dissatisfaction as one of the associated manufacturers under license from the Motion Picture Patents Company, we asked Mr. Berst if there were any foundations for those rumors. "None at all," he replied. "We are perfectly satisfied with our position, and are looking for beneficial results from it. We have entered into an agreement with the Patents Company, for twelve months, and have no intention of breaking that agreement. We are loyal to our fellow manufacturers, with whom we are on friendly terms. It is our desire to benefit the exchange men and exhibitors in every possible way. The manufacturers can very well take care of themselves."

We drew Mr. Berst's attention to the fact that many new manufacturers were entering the field, and that the International Company were also becoming prominent. "All this," he replied, "does not affect Messrs. Pathe's position. Pathe Freres have been making moving picture since 1895 or 1896."

We took occasion to congratulate Mr. Berst upon the very fine quality of the Pathe photographs, which were accepted as a standard of comparison throughout the world.

"That is because," said Mr. Berst, "we spend a great deal of money in the preparation of these films, and we engage the best available talent for the work. We don't look at the pictures of competing manufacturers. We are striving for the best ourselves. When to-day's work is finished, we endeavor to make to-morrow's better. That is the whole secret."

We pointed out that the Pathes are probably independent of any patent considerations, and the action they took in becoming one of the associated manufacturers. We received from Mr. Berst the confirmation of that idea. Most of the negative work of the firm is produced in France, and only the printing done here. Regard for alleged patent rights or claims had no weight with them in becoming one of the associated manufacturers. One statement Mr. Berst made, which we are sure will be read with interest by our readers, is, that while Pathe Freres at present confine their work to the printing of positives in this country, they propose shortly setting up a plant for the making of the negative. The film making industry in America will therefore receive a very important addition, which is bound to have considerable influence on the course of events.

We concluded a very pleasant little interview with Mr. Berst by congratulating him again on the fine quality of the Pathe's products. Generally, Mr. Berst's outlook is that of all intelligent men in the moving picture industry to-day, namely, it is a bright and hopeful one.

Wm. H. Swanson & Co. have opened their own slide making plant and in the future will manufacture song slides as well as advertising slides and announcement slides.

Gunby Bros. inform us that the demand for their lecturettes has kept pace with the notable improvement in the quality of their work. They now have a list of some fifty subjects, which they have arranged into a circulating library. Full particulars of the low price at which they can be obtained is contained in a circular which may be had from their office at 10 East Fourteenth street, New York.

A MUCH TRAVELLED CINEMATOGRAPHER.

Mr. J. Rosenthal, the well-known English maker of moving pictures, has recently narrated his varied experiences. Mr. Rosenthal has been three times through Africa, and spent twelve months there during the South African war. "I remember," he says, "nearly getting taken prisoner by the Boers at Pretoria. I went in before they had surrendered, and they started firing on me. Before they could capture me, though, they were themselves captured by some Canadian scouts. I had my horse killed under me while I was at work. Once I was at Elandsfontein, when the roofs above me were being perforated by bullets. We held up a Boer hospital train there, the Yorkshire Regiment blowing up the line, so that the train couldn't leave. I was standing at the side of an Australian trooper at the time, on the platform, when he was shot, and I helped him into the hospital train. While in South Africa I took a cinematograph picture of President Kruger in 1898. That was the only one ever taken of him in South Africa. I had to approach him through his son, Chard Kruger, as the old man would never speak English. I was at the second crossing of the Tugela, and a lot of my friends were killed at Spion Kop. I was with Lord Roberts from Bloemfontein to Pretoria, and was also with General Buller. From there I went to Pekin, with the expedition during the Boxer trouble. I saw the whole place smashed up, and went through the Forbidden City. Really, the thing wasn't so bad as the press made it out. Next I went to the Philippines, and put in four months with the American army. My next move was for Australia, where I went with the Prince and Princess of Wales when they went on the Ophir. From Canada I went to Port Arthur during the siege, being with the third Japanese army, under General Nogi. From the observation hills above Port Arthur I saw ships blown up from time to time. On one occasion I saw two Russian torpedo boats blown up by mines in the entrance to the port. It was dangerous anywhere, for you never knew where a shell was going to fall. A shell burst about 50 yards from my tent once. I saw all the big hand-to-hand actions there. Once I went down to photograph the Japanese 4.7 guns, but was unable to do so, as they were hidden. The turn-table of my tripod was of aluminum, and flashed in the sun. The Russians thought it was a heliograph, and as we were a pretty big party, going up the hill, they opened fire on us with ten-inch shells, things that stand about 3 feet high, and weigh about 300 or 400 pounds apiece. Another experience I had was when the Japanese captured the caponieres of North Fort. We were in a sort of protected trench that ran right round the fort, while the Russians were inside. I was next to a little Japenese soldier, who was shooting away at the Russians whenever they appeared, and fetching them down each time. I was going to the end of the trench when a Japanese officer flew at me, and pulled me down, saying that had I gone two yards further I should have been riddled by bullets, as the Russians were just round the corner. They blew up a portion of the fort, and we all got smothered with fine concrete, looking as if we had been dipped in flour."

Continuing his experiences at Port Arthur, he said he was at 203, Metre Hill, when 8,000 Japanese were blown to bits. "You could not go anywhere without seeing heaps of corpses. I've seen them stacked up higher than this room, while they filled up the trenches, and you had to walk over them." Through the jungles of Borneo was Mr. Rosenthal's next trip, where he saw several orang-outangs. A trip through India with the Prince of Wales followed, and then another journey through Burmah and Central China. Here some of the Chinese were inclined to be hostile owing to insurrections. They objected to being photographed, thinking that their souls were being taken.

UNIFORMS AND SCENERY PROPS.

By chance we came across one of the catalogues issued by Francis Bannerman, the dealer in second-hand army goods, at 501 Broadway, New York. If this catalogue is not already in the hands of every film manufacturer, it will pay them to send for a copy, as in it will be found uniforms, arms and accoutrements of every description—in fact, hundreds of articles which are in daily need by the film producer. The prices of these are so low that manufacturers will find it to their advantage to purchase from Mr. Bannerman instead of hiring from costumers and outfitters. It seems to us that exhibitors could also invest fifteen cents to good advantage for a copy and rig out their door attendants in suitable uniforms when a film of a military nature or of Wild West life was being shown. Selections could also be made of flags, guns, etc., which if displayed in the lobby would make effective advertising. The catalogue contains 260 pages and hundreds of illustrations. Postage, 15 cents.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

"If music be the food of love, play on," observes one of the late Mr. W. Shakespeare's characters. Another remarked: "Here will we sit and let the sound of music creep in our ears." Exactly my sentiments. Play on, and let it creep, creepily, creepulously, creepuloforically,—any old creep. So long as "it" is of the right kind. "The man that hath no music in his soul is fit for treasons, strategems and spoils." Another quotation from the same writer. William knew a thing or two about music and its effect upon the human man (and woman). Another poet, Byron, I think it was, called music, "Heavenly maid." Poets sometimes say quite sensible things.

The association between the moving picture and music is so close that I'm surprised the matter does not receive the attention it deserves at the hands of the exhibitors. Good instrumental accompaniments and effects help make or mar the success of an entertainment. Howe, Keith & Proctor and other prominent exhibitors pay particular attention to this point, and the result is their shows harmonize throughout and give equal satisfaction and pleasure to their patrons. The one musical flaw is, as a rule, the song slide. A theme of the lovelorn, set to lachrymose music provokes a lugubrious chorus, which panders to the transitory tastes of maudlin muliebrity—but oh! men and angels, we are not all sentimental gals and women. Some of us are men with a taste for humor. We larf.

Time after time protest, in these pages, has been made against the sickly namby pamby ballad and at last I perceive a glimmering of appreciation on the part of song slide makers that they are not taking advantage of their obvious opportunities. T'other afternoon I heard a man in a moving picture theater sing, "I'll Remember You." The slides were chic views of dainty girls, prettily colored and the burden of the words was distinctly gay. Never a bit about the long, long ago and it might ha' been and all that blithersome balderdash. No it was a bright and lively song set to a lilting little air, full of sparkle, and upon my blessed word we all liked that brilliant stream of catchy tunefulness.

Is there not room for more of the same sort of thing? Try humor, Mr. Song Slide Maker. You live in the land of humor. It surrounds you. It permeates people, places and things. Love is all very well in its way: but every honeymoon couple can tell you that it is apt to pall. I know. I've had one honeymoon. Never another for me; not if I know it. Then besides humor, you have war, pathos, real domestic sentiment, bravery, adventure, the virtues—in fact the field before the song slide maker is practically illimitable. Yet, withal this, he will stick to melancholy maudlinity and morbidity. Cut it out.

The first song slides I remember to have sat under were exhibited in London, a city of some magnitude in England. They were colored pictures of prominent persons, royalties, statesmen, warriors, publicists. The lady vocalist sang descriptive verses and the audience appreciated the act because it was of general and not merely of particular interest. That is the secret of success in a song slide; it must be of general interest. Love isn't. Most of us have finished with that sort of thing, whereas we are always interested in the broader phases of life such as I have listed in a previous paragraph.

And now after the lapse of many years I perceive that the song slide (like roller skating) is becoming popular again with English audiences: and that the descriptive song is furnishing the slide maker with his themes. Here surely is a hint for the American maker of song slides. Let him vary his subjects as much as the maker of motion pictures does; choose good words and good music; and if the American audience will insist upon having song slides at his m. p. entertainment, why getting them good and varied he will ask for more and everybody will be happy.

To utter a purely personal opinion, the illustrated song slide is no particular friend of mine. Music and motion pictures are all I want. I even draw the line at lectures or travelogues however good they may be. But I'm not everybody. If moving picture theaters relied upon the patronage of persons of my epicurean tastes they'd darn soon shut up Epicurean, however, as I claim to be, I'm also human and observant. I'm interested in what my fellow man (and woman) likes and dislikes, and why they like and dislike 'em. Evidently m. p. audiences like song slides; evidently they are tired of maudlinity; evidently they appreciate humor and other themes besides lo-o-o-ve, lo-o-o-ve, lo-o-o-ve. Evidently, therefore, if the song slide maker does not more liberally cater for this demand he is an Ass.

Why not try Baby? He's a good theme for a song slide set. There's all sorts of fun, as well as pathos, to be got out of the Kid. Mother-in-law, too! Think of the fun, she is good for. The street "cop." The—lor' bless me, if I were to start giving a list of suitable song slide subjects which I think would be appreciated by moving picture audiences I should fill up several pages of the World. And that would look so much like an advertisement of my own abilities as a song writer, that the lordly manager of the Advt. dept. of this mighty publication would smilingly present me with a copy of his Advt. Tariff. Sure he would.

MOVING PICTURE WARSHIPS TARGETS FOR ARTILLERY.

New Method of Practice to be Installed at Thirteenth Regiment Armory—Rubber Projectiles and Reduced Powder Charge Used.

Arrangements are being made for the installation of a new method of target practice in the armory of the Thirteenth Coast Artillery district, in Sumner avenue, Brooklyn, and, it is understood, in the armories of other coast artillery militia organizations in New York City. Moving pictures of war vessels will be displayed across the front of the target and will be fired upon by regulation coast defence guns, operating under greatly reduced powder charges.

At the present time the Fourteenth is equipped with three regulation size coast defence guns, a 12, 10 and 4-inch. These are made of wood, bound with malleable iron. Compressed air is used to hurl a rubber projectile at the target.

In the new arrangement it is intended to have a heavy wood target with a backing of several inches of sand. The moving pictures will show a fleet of war vessels approaching. As soon as the vessels can be seen distinctly the fire will begin.

The guns to be installed in the armory, it is said, will be as powerful as those used by the troops on Government reservations, but will not be as great in size. The rubber projectiles will be used, but the powder charge in the cartridges will be reduced greatly. The new guns will also be equipped with a sub-calibre apparatus similar to that used on practice guns in the United States Navy.

NOTES FROM OHIO.

Royal Theater, Sandusky, Ohio, under management of Carl Bitzer, was opened last week to capacity business. The theater has been remodeled throughout interior and exterior, five large arc lights placed in front of theater illuminating the street for several blocks. A double dissolving stereopticon has been installed for dissolving the song slides, this being the only machine of its kind in the city. Business has been good since opening.

The Theatorium, one of the best and neatest theaters in Sandusky, Ohio, under the management of Chas. Peark, a moving picture man of experience, is turning the people away nightly. Mr. Peark gives his patrons nothing but the best of selected pictures of the Association makers. Since he has installed a Hallberg economizer he has got the results of a good monthly saving on light bills as well as the brightest and clearest pictures in the city. Mr. Chas. Schukart, of Newark, Ohio, is the vocalist and one of the best in the city.

The Sandusky Theater, under the management of R. P. Stoddard, of Oneonta, N. Y., has been playing vaudeville and pictures for the past two weeks, as season has closed for road shows. This theater has a seating capacity of 1,300 and on Sunday night people are turned away. The programme on Sunday is made up of three reels of best Association pictures, illustrated song and straight song rendered by one of Sandusky's best singers, Miss Georgia Ungalls. Business during the week with high class vaudeville acts direct from Grand Circuit of Cleveland and two reels of pictures, has been very good. W. C. Kunzman is the operator of Vitagraph. The admission to this refined entertainment of amusement is only 5 and 10 cents, giving the amusement goers one hour of pleasure.

The Star Theater, Sandusky, Ohio, of which Havilein & Bremgartner are the managers, gave their patrons a programme of three reels of "The Great Wolf Hunt." Tuesday and Wednesday of last week for the small admission of 5 cents. People were turned away during the time this picture was shown at this theater. Mr. Geo. Stoner is the vocalist at this theater.

W. C. KUNZMANN.

Wm. H. Swanson & Co. have acquired control of 54 opera houses in the Middle West, in which houses will be presented Swanson's new and up-to-date Independent moving pictures. In conjunction with the moving pictures high-class vaudeville will be used in many of these houses. This concern is better equipped to handle this class of business not only because of the high quality of film service they furnish, but because of the fact that they have unequalled facilities for outdoor advertising and publicity in as much as they control their own show printing plant. They have a special line of paper especially adapted for this class of service. They also have under contract for the Summer season the best singers and pianists procurable, and amusement lovers in the cities in which Swanson & Co. will operate will be assured of the most elaborate entertainment in the moving picture field.

Notable Films of the Week.

Chinatown Slavery (Selig).

This week the Selig Polyscope Company, of Chicago, take a great leap forward in the quality contest in which, as we have previously pointed out, all the American film manufacturers are just now properly, and we hope profitably, engaged. For in "Chinatown Slavery" they have produced the notable film of this week—notable in respect of the two essential properties of technical and artistic excellence. The story of this film, which was told in detail last week, is not one that appeals to our personal predilections, for we do not believe in Chinese proselytism in any shape at all. The sincerity of your proselyte or convert in these times is always open to doubt. The missionary man, we venture to think, should restrict his missionary labors to his own kind, race or creed, and if we all did that, the world would probably be a nicer place to live in. (We beg the reader's pardon for this digression.)

What Selig has done in the film is to present to the eye, woven around this missionizing story, which ends happily by the usual marriage of the Christianized Chinaman and his sweetheart, a series of well-staged pictures of Chinese life, costumes, manner and character. We do not know whether these are all literally or archæologically accurate, our acquaintance with Chinese simply having been made in such large cities as New York and London, but we have witnessed many gorgeous Chinese spectacles in the great theaters of Europe, we have read Chinese books and studied Chinese ways, and Mr. Selig seems to us to have paid wonderfully minute attention to the details of this fine picture. It is truly gorgeous in effect. You have richness of costume, decoration and ornament. You also have in this picture a very appropriate toning or tinting of film, and the effect upon the mind is that of the passage across it of a moving panorama of Chinese life interwoven with a skein of American mundanity. The film is crowded with tense dramatic action and shows the most conscientious rehearsing and producing; indeed, the amount of work put into this film by those who made it is simply marvelous. There is, indeed, so much in it that it is difficult, if not impossible, to criticise it in detail. One is therefore perforce obliged to generalize and to rely upon the mental effect created by this strikingly beautiful piece of work. The last Selig film that we examined in detail was "In Old Arizona," and we were very favorably impressed by it, although some persons criticised its military details very unfavorably. Possibly from the standpoint of Chinese archæology this picture of Chinese slavery may be open to similar objections. Be that as it may, we have no hesitation in handing out our highest praise to this film on the three principal grounds we always keep in view when writing of moving pictures. First of all, it is a grand piece of photography, it is a splendid dramatic production, magnificently staged, and then through all its mazy panorama-like effects it tells a good story in a clear, intelligible, and interesting manner; and these are the things that make for notable films of the week. Mr. Selig has achieved a very great success in this picture, and we believe that it will have an enthusiastic reception wherever it is shown.

Wilbur Wright's Aeroplane (Pathe).

It was admitted on all hands last week that the one outstanding film of the week was the Pathe illustrating the movements of Wilbur Wright and his aeroplane. We drew attention to this remarkable film in two previous notes, but our appreciation of the picture is so great that we feel it is deserving of longer reference on this occasion. Moreover, we are gratified to see that our opinion of the picture was shared in by many audiences, who, at several New York moving picture theaters, greeted it with hearty applause. Nor is this to be wondered at.

The people, as we have so often pointed out, are never tired of recognizing a good thing; and they recognize a good thing in the Pathe aeroplane picture. To begin with, here you have shown by demonstration what the much talked of and written about aeroplane is and does. It is the invention of an American man, and consequently there is some ground for the manifestation of patriotic pride at this piece of epoch-making aeronautics having been worked out by two young men from Ohio, who have just returned to this country laden with the spoils of many air flying competitions in Europe.

The honors of this picture certainly belong to the photographer, who neglected no opportunity of showing the variety of action, and the wonderful dirigibility of the aeroplane. There is quite an exciting moment in the picture: Mr. Wright setting in motion the revolving blades or propellers, preparatory to taking his seat in the car. And then, when he sits down and grasps the levers just before the car leaves terra firma, all is tense excitement. Thereafter, this wonderful film is a record of the marvelous power in the conquest of the air which is concentrated in this frail-looking, bird-like structure. It rises practically to any desired height, it twists and turns, it skims, it undulates, it shoots rapidly ahead ,it does everything in fact in air which a human being does on land; in short, to quote the old saying, "it does everything but talk." Needless to say that moving picture audiences follow this remarkable series of pictures, for such they are, with breathless interest.

An interest begotten, not merely of excitement, but unconsciously of the fact that in looking at a moving picture of an aeroplane, they are watching two of the most wonderful outcomes of scientific research of modern times. For the moving picture itself, as any student of optics knows, is a thing of wonder of which the novelty will never fade so long as men, women, boys and girls have eyes in their heads; and when to this phenomenon we join, as it were, the outcome of Wilbur Wright's study in aerial mechanics which has solved the old problem of human flight, why, then, the "heir of the ages" must be looked upon as a lucky person, indeed, to live in times like the present. We well remember the inventor of the first flying machine in London over thirty years ago. He was a clever empiric whose machine managed to rise into the empyrean; then it collapsed and dashed its inventor to pieces. A happier fate has befallen the brothers Wright.

This picture is certainly "moral, entertaining and cleanly amusing." It interests and does not bore, it educates and does not tire, and its cleanliness is beyond discussion. To this kind of education in moving picture films we offer no objection at all, and we think Messrs. Pathe are warmly to be commended for a fine piece of moving picture work. We should like to see other manufacturers take advantage of every opportunity to use the moving picture camera in recording the wonders of modern science. There is a good field open for the work, and we are sure moving picture audiences would appreciate it as a relief to much of the inane vapidity they are compelled to endure.

The Premo Song Slide Company, of 934 Arch street, Philadelphia, Pa., send us for inspection a number of their colored song slides. The colored song slide has now so firmly established itself in favor with moving picture audiences, that it has become indespensable, and there is obviously a large and profitable business to be done in these pictures. The photographic preparation of the slide demands great skill, as also does the coloring. In the specimens before us the Premo Company thoroughly show that they appreciate the kind of production that is required by large classes of moving picture audiences. The latter like color which comes as a relief to the monochrome of the moving picture. Proprietors of moving picture theaters should send to the Premo Company for full particulars of their productions.

The Chicago Film Exchange are exhibiting at their show rooms a device for attaching to any machine for steadying the picture on the screen. We are furnished with no details, but the claim is made that it will enable a steady picture to be shown even if the sprocket holes of the film are worn or the sprockets on the machine are worn. The price asked for the device is $7.50, which is very cheap if it will do what is claimed for it.

Pathes' New Projecting Machine has met with such demand that three shipments have already been exhausted and the fourth shipment, which is on the way, is almost entirely sold out. The catalogue discribing this machine, which is sent free to all intending purchasers, gives a very good idea of the construction of the machine, but is very modest in telling of the many good features which instantly appeal to any mechanic who inspects it.

Toledo, Ohio.—The Princess, 239 Summit street, is now in its second successful year and enjoying the best and most select patronage of any five-cent theater in the city. Business at the present time is 40 per cent. better than at the same time last year. The Princess runs only moving pictures and music and is making a success. The discontinuance of vaudevill gave rise to a report in a theatrical paper some time ago that the Princess had closed its doors, when, in fact, it is doing better business than ever.

Comments on Film Subjects.

"A Road to Love."—A romance of a Yankee engineer in Central America is interestingly told by Edison in this film of almost 1,000 feet. In some parts the photographic quality of this film is very poor. Other scenes in the Central American jungle are good. The night scenes are nearly as good as the best the Edison people have put out, still there is a great deal to be desired in quality. The story is good and possibly in a measure compensates for the lack of photographic quality, but when a firm can do as well as the Edison people do in one or more instances there is little excuse for them to permit the quality of their films to deteriorate.

"Plain Mame."—A Vitagraph subject which is perhaps developed to prove that all that glitters is not gold, though the story has little interest or point. A shop girl, very plain as to feature, has for a "steady" a rather flashy young man. He takes her to a theater and falls in love with a chorus girl. He deserts his plain friend for the chorus lady and meets her the next night. An old lover of Mame asks her to go with him to an East Side ball. She takes the money she has saved for her wedding dress and gets herself up regardless. She is the belle of the ball, and the man who deserted her wants to make love to her, but is turned down cold. The girl he has with him gets jealous and leaves him. So there you are. No doubt such scenes as this are enacted every day in much the same way, and possibly in this respect this picture is a transcript of life. The quality is not up to the Vitagraph standard.

"Grin and Win."—A Vitagraph subject which advertises the cult of Billiken. The sour-faced family are constantly quarreling among themselves until the father falls under the spell of Billiken. He buys one of the heathenish looking images and takes it home. They are all converted when they tickle his toes and see him smile. This is a picture which causes a hearty laugh, even though one may feel certain that there is nothing funny about it. The spirit of the thing is contagious and before the audience knows it everyone is laughing. It is a good comedy and might well be included in any programme.

"The House of Terror."—A Lubin picture which creates a good deal of amusement. In passing a house a person notices a shadow on the curtain which seems to show that some one inside is being seriously handled. He alarms the neighborhood and, headed by the constable, they invade the place, only to find that a musical rehearsal of some sort is in progress and the silhouettes which excited the villagers so much were caused by an over enthusiastic master beating time as his pupil sang. This is a novel idea and is well worked out, and like most of Lubin's comedies, it is really funny.

"Boys Will Be Boys."—A Lubin comedy which represents the pranks of a brace of lively youngsters. They play all sorts of tricks on their elders, including their grandfather. There is a long chase after them which ends with finding them on the door steps fast asleep. The grandfather is first to pick up one and carry him into the house. The last scene shows them as good boys, fast asleep in bed.

"Uncle Tom Wins."—An Edison comedy which shows what an old colored man does when he wins $20,000 in a lottery. The most amusing part is the chagrin of the two young fellows when they discover that the money they were looking for was hidden under the bottom of a chair on which one of them sat. The acting is good, but the photography is not up to the standard of most of the Edison productions.

"An Unsuccessful Substitution."—An Edison film which represents the difficulties of a gentleman who had imbibed too freely and wanted something to reduce the size of his head. His wife stands guard constantly and prevents his getting what he wants. Finally he induces the servant to get into his place while he escapes through a window down a painter's ladder. When the wife discovers the substitution the servant gets his share of unpleasantness.

"The Worm Will Turn."—An Edison film which describes how Pepper succeeded in subduing a wife who made life a burden to him and increased the abuse by forever referring to her first husband, who was presumably lost at sea. He induced one of his friends to assume a disguise which made him look like the first husband. There was a storm when he appeared and demanded to know why she had married again. But when he left the house she followed him, only to discover that he was an impostor. But she returned to the second husband thoroughly subdued and ready to do his bidding, no matter how menial the service might be. Consequently Pepper's marital difficulties were settled by conjuring up a ghost of a much referred to individual. One can't agree with the humor of the piece, but it gets the laughs and that is the main proposition.

"Between Love and Honor."—A Pathe film in which two brothers love the same girl. She favors one which arouses the jealousy of the other and when they go hunting, the favored brother is lowered over a cliff, the jealous one attempts to cut the rope, but the girl arrives in time to prevent it. To save the man she loves she swears to renounce him. The scene when the lovers meet and she turns him away is good. He goes home to his mother and the girl writes a letter to the brother saying that she prefers death to dishonor and is going to plunge into the water, when the man arrives and prevents. He has promised his mother to give her up and together they go back to the other brother where he declares that he will interfere no longer. Like all the Pathe films the details are worked out with extreme care and the acting is beyond criticism.

"Your Turn, Marquis."—A Pathe film which illustrates what a marquis got who separated a pair of lovers, carried the young man away and shut him up in a deserted building, where he was heard by a shepherd boy and released by neighboring villagers. The marquis goes out to meet the girl, but the men secrete themselves behind trees and as the marquis comes by seize him and give him a good ducking in a fountain. The film hasn't much interest beyond seeing the marquis get a thorough wetting for presuming to make love to a young girl.

"The Falling Arrow."—One of the Lubin Western tales which has plenty of life and action and cannot fail to thrill the audience as it did where it was seen the first time. An Indian saves a young girl on the frontier from the unwelcome advances of an outlaw. He makes her presents and finally asks for her hand in marriage, but her father drives him from the house. Meanwhile the outlaw has determined to obtain possession of the girl and enters the house, thrusts the mother into a closet, throws a blanket over the girl's head and escapes with her on his horse. He imprisons her at his ranch. She tears a bit from her white skirt, fastens it to an arrow and shoots the arrow into the air. It falls at the feet of her Indian lover, who immediately goes after her. The rescue is effected after a sharp fight with the outlaw. In one detail this picture was more nearly true to actual life than any Indian picture hitherto shown. The Indian's horse had no saddle. The Indian merely jumped upon his back and rode swiftly away. The riding in this picture is unusually good and the action on the whole is true to life. There is a snap and go about the entire film which makes it especially desirable for almost any programme.

"Puzzle Mad."—A Lubin comedy which shows a man who has gone puzzle mad walking into all sorts of pitfalls and troubles and finally landing in a cell in an asylum where he sits all day and attempts to solve the puzzle. It is a novel conception and has merits as a bit of funny business.

"The Suicide Club."—A Biograph subject which shows a number of men in the most lugubrious manner possible drawing lots to see who shall be the next to commit suicide. It falls upon Frank Fairmount, the least lugubrious looking of any of them. The rest accordingly supply him with a large revolver, a huge knife, a bottle of poison and a rope. He goes home and while deciding which route he better select a maid brings him a note which says he has fallen heir to $50,000. He decides to postpone the commission of the act until the money is gone at any rate. The members of the club call upon him shortly after for an explanation and get it. He forces them at the muzzle of the revolver to sign a paper releasing him from his oath. In other words, they were perfectly willing to have him go, but were not particularly anxious to follow him and therefore signed when they saw the revolver pointing their way.

"The Eeavesdropper."—A Biograph film in which a peon wins the love of a handsome senorita. The girl's father is in financial difficulties, however, and the man who holds the mortgages says he will release him if he will give him the hand of his daughter in marriage. When asked the girl finally consents, but not until she has undergone a tremendous struggle. The rich suitor hears from an adjoining room the parting of the lovers. Just before they separate he enters, places their hands together and blesses them. As he passes out he presents the girl with the papers which clear her father's money difficulties. The facial expressions of the eavesdropper as he listens to the lovers are excellent. And the action of the lovers themselves is unusually good. They appeared more natural than most lovers do in motion pictures.

"The Beggar and the Ladies."—A Gaumont film which has elements of comedy in it far beyond what is usually presented. Two well intentioned old ladies take it upon themselves to attempt to ameliorate the condition of a crippled beggar who goes about the streets in a little wagon. They follow him to his home and undertake to improve his surroundings. They throw out all his full sized furniture and replace it with that which is shortened for the benefit of a man like himself whose legs have been cut off. As a matter of fact he is only a fake cripple and all these processes are extremely distasteful to him. He stands it all, however, until they bring in a young woman in the same condition and say they will marry them. He escapes by jumping through the ceiling of his house. The situations are funny because of the incongruity of two women undertaking to help a fake beggar. Possibly a lesson is taught here worth heeding. It might be well for philanthropic ladies to investigate more closely before they undertake to do things of this sort.

"Hippopotamus Hunting on the Nile."—A Pathe record film showing how the huge leviathan is hunted, towed to shore by the natives, skinned and the skin taken to camp. The last scene may be true to life, but is disgusting. It shows the natives scooping huge pieces of the fat out of bowls and eating it, the sub-title explaining that this fat is considered a great delicacy by the natives. One doesn't care to watch them eat. It is too sickening to the average person here.

"The Sculptor's Love."—A Vitagraph love story which begins with a girl being directed against her will to marry a certain duke. She decides to change clothes with her maid and go out for a holiday before the wedding. This is accordingly done and the two young women start out, only to encounter an adventure with a couple of criminals in which the young woman gets a sprained ankle. She is carried to the home of a young sculptor who falls in love with her. There is the usual time when her father discovers this, but in the end the lovers triumph and the sculptor and the girl are married and presumably live happily ever after. The duke is lost in the shuffle and does not reappear. The acting is good, but the staging in some parts might be improved. It doesn't seem quite natural.

"Marathon Craze."—A Vitagraph comedy which illustrates the Marathon craze by introducing a varied lot of runners and allowing a crippled old grandmother on crutches to win. Some of the pictures of a race actually in progress which are shown from time to time are excellent.

"Why the Mail Was Late." (Lubin).—In this film we have noted with pleasure a better photographic quality and a very superior acting. Some features of the plot are a little exaggerated. It does not seem very natural that a wounded man can kill three strong men in succession without meeting some resistance. When the anxious settlers are waiting for the mail and show us through their field glasses the poor carrier falling from his horse, we naturally suppose that the carrier is not at a great distance. Error, as we see the rescuers run over hills for a length of time, the field glasses used in the production of this film must have been of a new X-ray pattern to see at such a great distance, and this through the mountains. Otherwise the film was well received and is a great credit to the manufacturers.

"The Note in the Shoe."—This little sketch, in which the prank of a workshop girl results in her becoming the wife of the owner of the factory, seemed to appeal to the audience, judging from the uncommon applause it received from the spectators. A large share of this appreciation was no doubt due to the clever acting of the now popular Biograph stock company.

"The Old Hall Clock."—A very entrancing double romance is enacted in this Lubin film. The story is fairly well understood and the scenes and action vivid enough to carry, although the producer missed an opportunity to create one of the greatest film dramas of the times.

Keith & Proctor's 125th Street Theater discontinued vaudeville last Monday and started in to give an up-to-date selection of pictures and illustrated songs. Two of the latest model Power's Cameragraphs have been installed and the largeness of the screen and remarkable steadiness of the pictures will no doubt draw to this popular show house a steady clientele which will well reward the Messrs. Keith & Proctor for the move they have made.

"Dream Specters."—A Gaumont which allows of the introduction of magic features worth seeing. A man falls asleep and in his dreams all sorts of things appear to him including a ballet, though when he attempts to make love to one of the dancers they all disappear and ugly men appear in their places. The coloring and toning are good and the film is a very artistic production.

"Mephisto and the Maiden."—An ambitious production by the Selig Polyscope Company which reproduces in a condensed form Goethe's Faust. Everyone knows the story of Faust, how the monk sells his soul to the devil for one day of youth and love. The story is followed with considerable fidelity to the original text and the seduction of Marguerite is accomplished in a very delicate way. Perhaps the strongest scene is where the devil informs the youth that his time is up and that he must go back to his years. The youth's pleadings are very well done. The change is made according to contract and the film closes with the reunion of the lovers, Marguerite going back to her lover before the interposition of Faust. The technical quality of the film is excellent. The tinting in places is just sufficient to emphasize its beauties. The acting is all that could be asked in a picture of this sort. It is difficult to reproduce these familiar old classics. Those who have seen them acted are often impatient at the shortening made necessary by the limitations of the motion picture, while those who have never seen them acted and haven't read them seldom understand what they mean. If a film manufacturer successfully reproduces one of these pictures he is to be congratulated, and in this instance the best possible use has been made of the material. The effect cannot be too highly commended.

"For Kate's Health."—A Pathe comedy in which two children are sent into the country to stay with their uncle and aunt. The scrapes they get into and the troubles they multiply for others make the uncle and aunt heartily sick of their presence and the little folks are shipped back to their city home. The fun is of the kind which makes the audience laugh heartily.

"A Day in the Life of a Suffragette."—A Pathe reproduction of an imaginary day in the life of a suffragette. Some of it is rather coarse and the entire film might as well be left off the list. A manager will not gain much by placing it there.

"'Tis an Ill Wind That Blows No Good."—A Biograph subject which is worked out with all the Biograph excellencies. It represents a young man discharged from his place in a factory because he interposed to defend a young woman from persecution. He wanders long in search of work, but fails to find it. At last he drives a policeman who was chasing him for the theft of a loaf of bread into a deserted room where he forces the officer to give up his coat and hat. With these on he sallies forth. A woman is being abused by her worthless husband and rushes out to find an officer. She sees this fake policeman standing against a fence and induces him to go with her and make the arrest. This he does and upon arriving at the station house with the offender finds he has arrested a former criminal whom the police have been after for a long time. Just at this juncture the policeman whose coat he has rushes in and demands his property and when he explains the situation to the police officials is laughted at because he gave up his uniform. But they like the new officer so well that he is appointed on the force. The two then shake hands and go out to have something. Immediately after the newly appointed officer goes back to the factory and takes away the little girl whom he befriended. And as all is well that ends well the film may be well called an especially good one.

THE SUMMERS-BRITT FIGHT PICTURES.

This film, which is being issued by the Chicago Film Exchange, is making money for some exhibitors. The pictures are said to be the clearest and best ever taken of any fight. They show with rare fidelity every detail of the five best rounds, including the first and last, of the remarkable 20-round battle between Johnny Summers, England's lightweight wonder, and Jimmy Britt, America's former white lightweight champion, as it was fought under English rules before the National Sporting Club of London, England, February 22, 1909, for a purse of $5,000. It is a battle full of life and action, the men mixing from gong to gong, not an idle moment—just the kind of fight every lover of sport in your town will gladly pay you an extra admission price to see fought over again on a screen in your theater. Length of the film is 1,050 feet. The price of admission to the original performance in London ranged from $10 to $50 a seat. This gives you some idea of the absorbing interest of the public in this great international contest. Around the ringside are seated many of the most influential and foremost men of Great Britain as well as members of nobility.

These pictures were exhibited for the first time in the United States at the Trocadero Theater, Chicago, Ill., week beginning March 14. Regarding this attraction, Mr. I. Weingarten, the progressive manager of the Trocadero, who paid $350 for the first week's use of the pictures, says: "Price considered, the Summers-Britt fight pictures was one of the best paying special features I ever had."

Exhibitors who are looking for a sensation to awaken interest in their shows should not fail to get into communication with the Chicago Film Exchange, 50 Jackson boulevard, Chicago, Ill., who have secured the sole rights for the exploitation of this film.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ADVICE TO OPERATORS.

By One of Them.

New York, April 26, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Being a constant reader of your most valuable paper, I have taken a great interest in many of your articles which have in view the uplifting of the moving picture business in general.

I am employed as projecting electrician by a high class traveling lecturer and your advice to operators is of especial interest to me. It is to be regretted that more of my fellow operators do not try to digest and assimilate the many valuable points which appear in your journal from week to week.

I am on the road nearly all the time and have a good chance to judge the merits of the shows in the many different cities which we visit, and I regret to say that the poorest shows I see are right here in Greater New York, and even in the better class of houses here this holds true. Having given the matter careful thought and attention and in an unbiased way, it is my firm belief that this state of affairs is due in a large measure to careless and indifferent work on the part of operators. This is made especially plain when I state that one day last week, in a prominent Twenty-third street house, I saw the "Life of Napoleon" projected, and in one of the most interesting scenes of the picture the same was out of the frame for a period of seventy seconds by actual timing. Now there is absolutely no excuse for such work, and the manager who tolerates it is more to blame than the operator, and as long as such conditions exist, so long will the picture business remain at its present level, and my advice is, wake up, Mr. Manager, demand better work from your operator, and if he is not capable of attaining better results, put a new man in his place even if you have to pay a few dollars a week extra; for rest assured, it will prove a paying investment for you in the long run. There are many things which detract from the interest of a moving picture to an audience but none more than a poorly projected picture.

It is surprising to note how little interest the average operator takes in improving his work and how many little details which are so essential to good work on the screen, are entirely overlooked by them. In the majority of cases this is due to a lack of knowledge of some of the most simple rules of electricity and its uses in relation to projection work, but in many it is due to improper training from the start, mixed with a lberal amount of criminal carelessness and stupid indifference, if this is not too plain.

Now, Mr. Operator, try for better results, improve your pictures and let your aim be to show the best in your city, and if you hit the mark it will mean improved and better conditions for all your fellow workers in general, for as you improve your work you create competition and force your neighbor to attain better results in order to hold his own, and remember competition is a stepping stone to the achievement of success.

The article now appearing in your paper by F. H. Richardson should prove a great help to all operators who really desire to improve their work, as they are clear, concise and to the point, with an entire absence of any technical terms which might have a tendency to confuse the novice in the electrical line, and I hope these articles will be published in book form later on and that every ambitious and energetic operator in the country will have one and study it carefully. By so doing the picture business will be greatly improved all over the country and the standard of operators would be raised to a much higher level than it is at present, and surely it would mean better wages all round.

Yours truly,

F. W. SWEET.

[The Moving Picture World is open to receive contributions from expert operators that will benefit others, and will pay for articles by good men. We know that their time is limited for writing, but any hints of value will be gladly received, however crudely written. We will take care of that part. We will devote a column or a page each week to "Wrinkles for Operators" and if they will make this paper a clearing house for their ideas they will all profit from the interchange of experiences. Even the know-it-all might get a good tip and he should not be slow in airing his knowledge.—Ed. M. P. W.]

NOT ENOUGH INDEPENDENT FILM WEST OF THE ROCKIES.

Seattle, Wash., April 26, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—In looking over your issue of April 17, on page 483, I wish to correct a statement made by Mr. Heinz, now proprietor of the Gem, 714 East Baltimore street, Baltimore, Md. When I opened that place I was the only Independent house in Baltimore and secured my service from Williams, Brown & Earle, now called Philadelphia Projection Company, Mr. V. R. Carrick, president; and I wish to state that when the association formed I stood by the American flag, which means freedom, and as long as I remain in the moving picture business will always stand by it. Mr. Carrick gave me agency for the State of Maryland, which was on February 1. In less than one week I was supplying ten houses in Baltimore; in fact, I could have secured more, but they could not furnish me with the film.

The latter part of March I sold out my place, which included this agency, came out here and opened a theater called the Savoy, formerly owned by M. Christie.

I have written to at least ten film manufacturers and renters asking them for the agency, as there are twenty moving picture parlors in Seattle, and they all run Association, I, myself, until I can secure Independent.

My hook is out and am willing to help the Independents all I can, and if there is anything that you may suggest in order that I can secure an agency for the State of Washington I will appreciate it very much. Yours truly,

WM. G. SPURRIER.

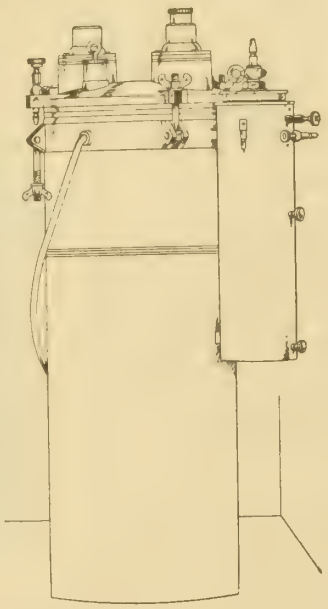
PORTABLE GAS-MAKING OUTFIT
EDISON OXYGEN GENERATOR



What Motion Picture Exhibitor has not at times wished that he had a reliable and inexpensive means for producing gas that would render him independent of the electric light companies? Traveling Exhibitors, especially, have often felt the need of a good outfit that would take the place of calcium outfits, which are frequently difficult to get or are held up in transit when wanted the most.

The Edison Oxygen Generator and Saturator fill this need. They have been designed to produce a complete generating outfit to take the place of Oxygen and Hydrogen gas sold in cylinders. This apparatus produces the gases automatically, in a safe, simple and direct manner, without the necessity of any knowledge of chemistry on the part of the operator.

The Oxygen is produced by the reaction between water and a compound of which Sodium Peroxide is the principal ingredient. This compound in its most compact and convenient form is known as Oxone, though the Generator will work equally well with another form of the compound known as Oxylithe.

Retorts, rubber bags, wash bottles, pumps and cylinders are entirely done away with. There is nothing to do but to put in the Compound and water, attach the gas outlet to the Ether Saturator and adjust the flame by the needle valves on the Saturator. The apparatus does the rest.

We want every present or prospective Motion Picture Exhibitor to write us for detailed information about this outfit.

Stories of the Films.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

A BABY'S SHOE.—The story tells of the young widowed mother of two children who is forced by extreme poverty to part with one of her children, a baby girl, by placing it in a basket on the door steps of a wealthy banker. Before leaving the baby the poor mother takes one of its little shoes to keep as a memento. Returning to her cheerless home she is seized with a paroxysm and falls lifeless in a chair, with her little boy at her side. A neighbor hearing her cries runs for the parish priest, who finds the poor woman beyond human aid. Her soul has departed into eternity. She still clutches the little shoe which mutely tells the woman's sad story. The good priest takes the boy as well as his sister's shoe. Meanwhile the baby has been found by the banker and his wife and they decide to adopt it. Fifteen years elapse and we find the girl grown up in blissful ignorance of her origin, of course imagining the banker and his wife her parents, while the boy has gone through his collegiate course preparatory to Holy Orders. One afternoon while walking in the park the boy's attention is attracted by a runaway, and leaping to the roadway he seizes the bridle of a wild fractious horse and brings it to a standstill. Assisting the young lady occupant of the vehicle to a taxicab he escorts her to her home. A strong friendship between the two young people ripens later to love and the boy is seen struggling between the all-important questions as to his future, whether it be religious or secular. His love for the girl is so strong, so pure, that he determines to gain the old priest's consent to his marrying instead of entering the priesthood. What a blow it is to the good old father, but he feels it may be for the best and consents even to marry them. Now the banker's wife thinks it only just to the young people to reveal the truth about the girl, telling how she found her fifteen years before, and that one of her little shoes was missing. At this intelligence the old priest is staggered, for he sees at once that the marriage cannot take place—they are brother and sister. He raises his head in thanksgiving for the grace of God that brought about this timely revelation. However, brother and sister find "The peace that passeth all understanding." She becomes a nun and he goes to his ordination into the priesthood, giving their future lives up to the honor and glory of the Divine Master whose guiding hand showed the better way.

JONES AND THE LADY BOOK AGENT.—There is no question that the good natured man is always made the "Patsy," and so it is that poor Jones, who is benignity personified, is always getting into hot water. His latest episode is an experience with a female book agent, who tried to sell him a book entitled. "How to Be Happy, Tho' Wedded." The work does not appeal to affable Edward, and he with gentlemanly firmness ejects her from his office, as his friend Dick Smith enters, to whom he mimics the ludicrous antics of his visitor. All this is witnessed by this modern Clio, who is peeking through the keyhole. She vows to be revenged, and seeing a box of gloves which Jones has bought for his wife, she substitutes her corsets for the gloves, writes a note which she puts in his overcoat pocket, asking him to return her corsets, and finally sends a letter to Mrs. Jones warning her of her husband's perfidy and to search his pockets for proof. Does the scheme work? Well there seems to a certainty a case of "Jones vs. Jones" appearing on the calendar of the divorce court in the near future, but the book agent becomes conscience stricken and sends a letter of contrition to Mr. and Mrs. Jones, explaining everything. Peace again reigns and Jones receives the osculatory balm on his throbbing forehead. Length, 589 feet.

THE FRENCH DUEL.—Extreme tranquility bovered over the Salon litteraire of the Club Montmartre, and the members seemed to be in a state of ennui, the silence being broken only by the ticking of that horometrical instrument, the clock, when Mons. Leon Martinel enters in company with Mons. Gaston Tortoni, whom he introduces to Mons. Alphonse de Signoles. Alphonse orders le garcon bring a round of cocktails, and he puts an olive in each. This Tortoni objects to, but Alponse insists, "Oui! oui!" Tortoni then with thumb and forefinger extracts the olive from the cocktail, and hurls it—yes, hurls it in the face of Alphonse. Consternation! The members stand aghast until Alphonse retailates in like manner. Amazement! The feud is on, honor must be satisfied; a duel is inevitable, and speculation keen, as Alphonse is in the bantam class, while Tortoni is a replica of the Eiffel Tower. On the field of honor, beside the ruins of the old Conciergerie, they meet. A corps of trained nurses, doctors and undertakers arrive, and the seconds prepare the weapons, while the undertakers measure the contestants for their prospective receptacles. Muskets are first selected, but one of them accidently discharges and throws the party into hysterics, so they are discarded. Rapiers are finally resorted to and a most furious combat is precipitated, which would have resulted fatally for Tortoni had he not had a tin tray concealed beneath his vest as a shield, and so the duel finishes to the entire satisfaction of everybody but the undertakers.

EDISON MANUFACTURING CO.

LUNATICS IN POWER.—A good-natured old uncle is induced by his two favorite nieces to visit an insane asylum. The trio arrive during mealtime. Uncle, while waiting the arrival of the superintendent, wanders around and incautiously enters an empty room. As he is about to come out, a keeper passes and thinking Uncle is a lunatic trying to escape, forces him back and locks him in the room. Uncle protests, but to deaf ears. Finally becoming excited, and very mad, he makes a terrible racket. Keepers arrive and undertake to quiet him. He escapes them, and they have a lively chase through several rooms. During the excitement they run across the lunatics who have just had their dinner and who join in the chase. One lunatic succeeds in closing the door on the keepers and locks them up. Uncle, however, hides behind a curtain. The lunatics hold a consultation over Uncle, decide that he is insane and that he is a chicken and immediately proceed to transform him into one. A pillow furnishes the necessary feathers and molasses the sticker. In honor of his arrival they decide to have a feast with chicken as the main dish—Uncle to be the chicken. Ere they can execute their fell design, the nieces arrive on the scene in search of "Nunkey." They are ushered in by one of the insane "trustees" who imagines himself to be the superintendent. He invites them to stay for the chicken dinner. In the meantime the superintendent (locked in a sparate cell) sees the "Queen of Sheba" parading near-by. He makes love to her and she, delighted, condescends to open the cell door. He liberates the keepers in time to prevent Uncle being sacrificed. The lunatics are driven to their rooms, and Uncle and nieces depart all vowing "never again" to enter an insane asylum. Approximate length, 945 feet.

THE PONY EXPRESS.—When Mohammed called upon the mountain to come to him and it came not he very wisely went to the mountain. In this age of scientific miracles the moving picture brings to the auditor, comfortably seated, in a cosy theater, many a far-off scene of interest, or reconstructs historic scenes and events of the past. The stirring days of early Western life are faithfully reproduced in our thrilling picture, "The Pony Express," showing the dangers and hazards of those days. Jim, the Pony Express Rider, is in love with Hazel, the beautiful dauhter of a settler, but her admirers are many and among them Jack, a cowboy of the "X. Y. Z." ranch is the most devoted. Jim, starting on his journey is warned to look out for hostile Indians who are on the warpath. Shortly after leaving the relay station, he is pursued by a scouting party and wounded. His faithful pony is shot, and from over his prostrate body Jim puts up a gallant but seemingly hopeless defence. Jack, who has been out after buffalo, attracted by the sound of firing, attempts to ride to Jim's assistance, but in turn is pursued by the Indians, wounded, and only by a ruse escapes. Riding to the settlement, he reaches Hazel's cabin in time to warn her, and sinks unconscious at her feet. Hazel rides to the station, and leads a party of plainsmen to the rescue. They arrive in time to rescue Jim. Hazel and her father carry Jim home on the father's horse. The rescue party follow the fleeing Indians and wipe them out. Approx. length 765 feet.

SEE A PIN AND PICK IT UP, ALL THAT DAY YOU'LL HAVE GOOD LUCK.—To all great movements there is always an "advance" and a "rear guard." To day the "world's advance guard" is seriously considering the problem of communicating with our fellow-planet, Mars. The "rear guard" is concerned with dead men's laws, why does a chicken cross the street, and other old superstitions. Our hero belongs in the last rank of the "coffee-coolers." He would not pass under a ladder for a fortune. Friday is his evil day. Ever on the alert for trouble, he stumbles over a pin and is happy because he knows now that "luck" has befriended him. Leaving home in the morning, he keeps his "weather eye lifting," for horseshoes, ladders, white horses, and pins. He finds a pin and pounces on it as if it were a golden nugget and proudly secures it in the lapel of his coat. But the charm somehow fails to work, for before he goes far he has a bad fall. In haste he tries to make up for lost time, loses his car, and thereby misses an important engagement. While sadly pondering on the "pins" perversity, a bicycle upsets and worries him. Well, he gets his car, but finds he has lost his pocketbook, and, unable to pay his fare, is thrown off. In consequence he is late for his train, makes a mad rush to catch it, elbows people right and left, is arrested, and finally, in the solitude of a cell has time to remember that it's a "poor rule that will not work both ways," and then throws the "blamed pin" away. Approximate length, 235 feet.

THE BACHELOR'S WIFE.—A young man who has always obtained money from his doting uncle, with which to satisfy his debtors, finds his debts accumulating so rapidly that, in order to gain the desired amounts, he writes his uncle—first that he is married; next that he has a child, and finally that he must have more money for clothes for them both. The uncle, becoming suspicious, writes his nephew that he will call and visit him and his family. The nephew, on receipt of this letter, becomes frantic, knowing that he must produce a wife and child, or his uncle will cut him off because of his deceit. He rushes into the street and asks the first woman he meets to be his wife for a day, and promptly has his face slapped. He tries this several times with the same result, until he meets a slavey scrubbing a stoop. She consents, and after buying her a handsome gown and decking her out, he gets her to his quarters after many mishaps, just in time for the uncle's arrival. The uncle, surprised at her antics at dinner, demands to see the child. The nephew rushes to the janitor and giving him some money tells him to get him a baby immediately and he will give him more money. The janitor rushes out, and after trying unsuccessfully to steal two babies, he at last spies a baby alone in a carriage, grabs the child and rushes to the nephew with it. As he bursts into the rooms with the baby, which has a heavy veil over its face, the nephew grabs the child and proudly hands it to his uncle. The denouement is reached when the uncle, lifting the veil, discovers a negro baby. The mother of the child, a big negress, enters in a rage, seizes the child and puts all to flight. Length, 550 feet.

MR. FLIP.—A young man considers himself quite irresistible, and through his egotism runs the gamut of misadventures. After dressing himself in extraordinarily bad taste, he sallies forth to conquer the fair sex. He first enters a dry goods store, approaches the ribbon counter and endeavors to start a flirtation with a saleswoman, and is severely reprimanded by receiving a slap in the face, and is ejected from the store. He then in turn enters a manicuring parlor, telephone office, a lady barber shop, bar room and lunch room, and in each instance his fate is the same as that experienced in the dry goods store.. However, he apparently refuses to be subdued, and we next find him occupying a box seat at a vaudeville show. A very attractive soubrette is doing a song and dance, and after starting a flirtation with her, he sends her a bouquet with his card, requesting that she meet him after the show. The actress, upon going to her dressing room, formulates a plan to have her colored maid keep the appointment she has with the would-be dude, and accordingly places her coat and hat upon the negress, covering her face with a heavy veil. The young man, waiting at the stage door, meets the wench, and together they enter a cafe. After ordering a sumptuous repast, Mr. Flip endeavors to embrace his companion, and in doing so her veil is disarranged, revealing the fact that she is a negress. The result causes great excitement and he is roughly ejected by the waiters in attendance. He finally meets his Waterloo at the hands of a bevy of laundry girls. Length, 450 feet.

PATHE FRERES.

MIREILLE'S SINCERE LOVE.—Mireille is a pretty peasant girl who is much beloved by a youth named Vincent, and their young lives are illuminated with the light of hope that some day in the near future they shall become man and wife. In the first picture we see Mireille berry picking and soon Vincent comes upon the scene, and, he being an ardent wooer, it is not long before the maiden's thoughts are diverted, and she strolls away with him through the meadow, listening to his words of love. The happy young couple go to an old chapel where they take a mutual vow that they shall always love one another and live for each other's happiness alone.

Going then to the home of the maiden, the latter demurely stands aside while Vincent tells her stern old father of their future plans, and begs the old man's consent for his daughter's hand in marriage. Upon hearing the proposition the father becomes infuriated and stoutly refuses to sanction the match, ordering the young man off of his premises. Being of a gentle disposition and having respect for old age, Vincent leaves the place, while the disappointed girl is forced to remain and hear her father's strong denunciation.

Realizing that her hopes of future happiness are shattered Mireille decides to go away, so leaving the old homestead she starts out to face the world and seek consolation among strangers. As she trudges along the lonesome country road she becomes footsore and exhausted, and falls to her knees in front of a shrine, where she prays for strength and fortitude to bear up under her terrible weight of anguish.

In the meantime Vincent sets out to find her and comes upon the prostrate girl at the shrine, and taking her in his arms he leads her away. They go to the old rendezvous and he tries to cheer her with his kind words, but it is too late, for her hopes are shattered and she is beyond earthly aid, and, while listening to his words of love, the unhappy girl passes away in Vincent's arms. Length, 528 feet.

A STRIKING RESEMBLANCE.—This funny comedy of mistaken identity shows a married man who is injudicious enough to carry on a clandestine flirtation with another woman, and, consequently, gets himself into a rather embarrassing position. He receives a note from his lady love's big brother asking him his intentions, and, incidentally, mentioning the painful fact that unless he marries the girl soon he must suffer the consequences. Realizing his great plight, the deceitful wooer starts out to call on his adored one, and while strolling down the street he meets a fellow who is the exact duplicate of himself in appearance. He hails the jolly stranger and explains the trying situation to him and the latter consents to help him out of the difficult position by assuming his responsibilities in the affair. After receiving the necessary instructions the stranger goes to the home of the young lady and the latter, thinking that it is her lover, receives him most profusely and he, taking advantage of the situation, makes himself thoroughly at home. It is not long, however, before the girl's brother puts in his appearance and demands that the fellow promises to marry his sister, which the lover gladly consents to do. The prospective bridegroom then starts out to purchase the wedding ring and in the meantime his fiance receives a note stating that her intended husband is a married man, also giving the address where he can be found living with his wife. She starts out with her infuriated brother to investigate and on the way she meets the masquerader, and when he hears the charges against him he stoutly denies his guilt and consents to accompany the couple to the given address where they find the first fellow just as they anticipated, but thinking that it is a case of mistaken identity on their part they apologize for their intrusion and the happy girl consents to become the wife of the second fellow without ever knowing the circumstances that surround her love affair. Length, 384 feet.

THE HUNTER'S GRIEF.—It is little Jay's sixth birthday and the happy youngster is the recipient of many pretty toys, among others a miniature rifle, which is the delight of his little heart. His father, being a great sportsman, the youngster possesses similar tastes and now feels that he is in a position to accompany his elders on their hunting expeditions. Much to his disappointment, however, his daddy and grandfather start out duck hunting, leaving the little chap at home. Even their promise to take him some other day fails to cheer him up. The little fellow feels that he has been treated unjustly, so decides to go anyhow, and we see him stealing from the house with his little rifle over his shoulder and following the older folks to the hunting ground.

The huntsmen are now near a large pond where they are shooting wild duck. Little Jay steals along on the opposite side and hides behind a stack of straw without being seen by his relatives. His father takes aim and fires at a bird, but misses his shot and the bullet penetrates the bundle of straw, striking the boy crouching behind it. The men, upon hearing his screaws, hasten over to investigate, and great is their horror when they discover the lifeless form of little Jay lying on the ground. The distracted father is inconsolable in his terrible grief and becomes hysterical and shows signs of losing his reason. Finally with the aid of some men they carry the child home to his heartbroken mother, who knew nothing of his having left the house. When the motionless little form is laid on the couch the sorrowful parents are indeed a piteous spectacle, and so terrible is the father's grief that the other members of the family become alarmed over his mental condition, and hastily summon a physician to administer to the unfortunate man. By the time the doctor arrives the patient is a raving maniac; oblivious to all that has just transpired, and is hurried away to a sanitarium.

A year has now gone by and another little baby has come into the sorrowful family, and the mother thinking that its presence may have a soothing effect upon the mind of her husband goes one day to the sanitarium with her father and the little one. They meet the invalid in the yard, but much to their disappointment he fails to recognize them, nor does he pay the slightest heed to the new baby.

Finally we see the same youngster six years later when he has grown to be the exact duplicate of little Jay, and the good people, always anxious to have the invalid once more in their midst, try again to bring him back to his senses by making him believe that little Jay is really among them again.

The grandafther therefore goes to the asylum dressed in his hunting costume and makes the patient put on his hunting outfit also; he then brings him home where everything about the house wears the same ascept as on the fatal day some six years before. The first thing that the invalid recognizes upon entering the room is Jay's large picture, and immediately he shows signs of regaining his memory. He then asks for the little fellow and the mother brings in the youngster dressed exactly like Jay. The shock is so great that it has the desired results and the cloud lifts from the unfortunate man's memory and he is under the impression that it is really Jay whom he is fondly caressing.

One day, becoming suspicious that there is something strange in it all, he follows his wife when she and her little son go out to the cemetery to visit Jay's grave. They are greatly surprised when the husband and father comes upon them, and after reading the inscription upon the tombstone he is convinced of the true state of affairs. The sorrowful man then gives vent to his feelings, after which he starts for home with his little family, giving thanks to God for the presence of the loving child to fill the place in his affectionate heart left vacant by the death of Jay. Length, 974 feet.

MANUFACTURING STEEL RAILS.—This very interesting picture gives a vivid idea of the manufacturing of rails in a modern steel plant, and shows the many evolutions of the rough mineral before it reaches a perfect state of commercial value. In the first picture we see the massive furnaces, then the fluid being poured into moulds and being transformed into steel through the mixture of air charged with oxygen. We then see the melting of the steel bars and the fluid is put into

A FAITHFUL OLD HORSE. Some wood choppers start out on a cold Winter day and drive into the forest to get some fire wood. They take a little boy with them and arriving at a remote spot they alight from the sleigh and build a bonfire. Leaving the little fellow in charge of the horse and their belongings they go a long distance into the woods to cut trees. The little fellow allows the fire to go out, and it being extremely cold he keeps moving about in order to keep his blood in circulation, but finally becoming impatient he gets into the sleigh and starts out to find the men. He drives quite a distance out of the track and a blinding snow storm comes up which makes it difficult for the child to find his way. Finally becoming numb with the cold he tries to warm himself with the old horse's breath, but this proves ineffective, and the little fellow falls to the ground, exhausted.

The old horse, realizing that something has happened, retraces his steps to the place where the men left him, arriving there just as they come back and are showing great alarm at the child's absence. The horse starts out and the men follow, and soon he leads them to the spot where the little fellow fell, and there, to their great surprise, they find the child covered with snow and nearly frozen to death. They are not long in reviving him, and when he realizes all that he owes the animal, his childish demonstration of affection for the faithful old horse is profusive. Length, 394 feet.

A WOMAN'S HEART. This pathetic little drama tells an interesting story of a man who has been divorced and remarried without telling his second wife that he was ever married before. One day he receives a note from his former wife stating that she is ill and pleading with him to come to her and take their little child before she dies. He goes immediately to the afflicted woman and all unkindness is forgotten, for her life is nearing its end, and after receiving his promise that he will raise the little one the mother peacefully passes away.

His wife is in a terrible state of anxiety when he does not return, but her fears are soon alleviated, for she receives a note from him telling her that he is called out of town on business. When his former wife is laid away he finds himself in a very precarious position, for he must live up to his promise and take his little child home with him, but it remains a matter of conjecture how his wife will act when she learns the true state of affairs. He gets the little one ready and returns to his wife, who is happy to see him again, but when she sees the child she is somewhat perplexed. Finally the man takes courage and confesses all, and the woman for the moment is horrified, and will not entertain the idea of taking the child to her heart. The little one goes over and in her innocence kneels before the tearful woman with a pleading look on her little face, and, true to her motherly instinct, her heart becomes softened and she clasps the little orphan in her arms. The happy father is overjoyed at the turn of affairs and the good wife assures him that the little child shall be cared for as though it is her own. Length, 394 feet.

THE TWO DONKEYS.—Two jolly fellows going along the country road meet an old peasant who is leading a donkey, and thinking that they will have some fun at the old man's expense, one of the youths takes the halter off of the donkey and puts it over his companion's head. Without discovering the change the old fellow continues on leading the supposed donkey home, while the other fellow makes away with the animal.

Arriving at his destination, the peasant discovers the joke being played on him and taking advantage of the droll situation he turns the joke upon the trickster and makes him assume the role of a donkey, much to the latter's displeasure. The old fellow then receives a note from a friend stating that he has found a purchaser for the animal, and asking him to come immediately. He takes the youth who is tied in the halter to the purchaser and sells him, receiving a good sum after which he has a good laugh at the joker's expense. Length, 298 feet.

IN THE BAD LANDS: A Tale of Army Life on the Frontier.—A military ball is in progress at the post and all the officers and young men of the regiment are tripping the light fantastic. Carlton Langdon, a surgeon of the garrison, is disliked by most of the fellows in his company for surly manner and peculiar nervous irritability. For a time no one suspected the real cause of his bearing, but secrets, such as he held, are sooner or later discovered, and so it was with no surprise that reports of him being addicted to the use of morphine gained credence. He was in spite of his failing, however, a splendid surgeon and for that reason more than any other he was tolerated and his eccentricities overlooked. Now the Colonel of the post had a beautiful daughter, Isabel, for whom Langdon entertained a feeling closely allied to worship. The thought of possessing her for his wife grew upon him day by day until it became the one great absorbing interest of his life. For her, he made a desperate effort to relinquish the drug that seemed to have him as in a grip of steel and for a long while almost succeeded. But repeated failures in his efforts to obtain one ray of hope from the fair Isabel drove him back to the fatal vice that seemed to saddle itself upon him with redoubled fury.

In the opening scene of the picture we see him, nerve-racked, with staring eyes and trembling hands. He makes one last appeal to the object of his adoration and receives a rebuff that completely stuns him and leaves him limp, and broken in heart and spirit. Isabel tells him that it is useless for him to plead his cause further. That she has just given her heart and hand to Earl Holden, Troop D's dashing first lieutenant. With a toss of her pretty head she trips away to join the others at the banquet table. It is Christmas time and the spirit of revelry and joy pervades the entire post. Everyone seems happy—everyone but Langdon, whose passion is just then eating at his heart. With a bitter curse for his hated rival, he staggers out into the night to cool his fevered brow and try to regain his composure. A horseman is seen in the distance making his way laboriously toward the gates. It's a carrier from headquarters. Springing from his mount, he makes his way into the stockade and from there to the big messroom where the banquet is in progress. He bears an important message to the Colonel. The Sioux are again on the warpath, committing many depredations and terrifying the settlers for miles around. "Send out a squad to investigate conditions," says the General in his message. The Colonel knows it will require men of nerve and unusual daring, so the first man he thinks of to head the expedition is the handsome Lieutenant of Troop D, young Holden. Orders are quickly given and acted upon, and while the dance is still in full sway, a little squad of cavalry files out through the heavy gates and is soon lost to view.

Watching them out of sight, Langdon laughs in mirthless tones to think of the danger that lurks on every hand beyond those forbidding hills.

He will never come back alive. He will never return to her alive," the maddened surgeon repeats, over and over again. And his prophecy nearly comes true. For the sun has scarcely kissed the hilltops with his shafts of fiery red, when the little squad of fighting men ride direct into an Indian ambuscade. It is a fight to the death—no quarter is asked or given. Finally by sheer bravery and superior marksmanship the boys in blue scatter their treacherous foe and return to look after their own dead and wounded.

The Lieutenant is found with an ugly hole in his side and almost dead from the loss of blood. Tenderly his men lift him on to a hastily improvised drag and urging their jaded horses to their utmost strength, the long, desperate return journey is begun. Toward evening the sentries at the post sight the little cavalcade coming through the snow and at once the alarm is given, so that when the worn and half-dead expedition reaches the outer gates, every preparation has been made for their comfort and for the care of the wounded.

Bearing up with remarkable tenacity, Holden wins the fight against death and in a few days is on the road to recovery, much to the joy of his sweetheart and to the bitter disappointment of his rival, the surgeon.

In his crazed mind Langdon finally conceives and hastily carries into execution a most diabolical plot.

Mixing a deadly concoction, he attempts to poison the Lieutenant, but is frustrated by the watchful eye of Old Pete, the negro cook, who happens upon the surgeon as he is mixing the fatal potion. This last act of madness ends Langdon's career at the post, for he is placed under arrest, but afterward escapes and perishes in the cold, having wandered [illegible] aimlessly about, until overcome by fatigue he lies down and the snow falling quietly covers [illegible] as white shroud.

[illegible] quickly recovers and soon resumes [illegible] Future holds for him a most [illegible] in the shape of Miss Isabel Wal[illegible] charming daughter, who has [illegible] Miss Pearl Hobber on her next [illegible] feet.

FOR HER COUNTRY'S SAKE.—A story of the Civil War, opening at Headquarters of General Logan. He is conversing with his officers as an aide enters and hands him a card reading, "Nell Belmont, United States Secret Service." The young lady is ushered in, goes to a map on the table and explains certain conditions. At this moment a telegraph operator hands the general a message from Burke, Captain of the Scouts, recommending that all important dispatches be sent in duplicate by two messengers taking different routes. Mack, a young officer, volunteers to take one, while Nell signifies her willingness to deliver the other. The young man starts off, the girl changes her clothes for male attire and also departs. Through the woods she comes upon a squad of Rebel cavalry, but successfully eludes them. Shortly after, she is forced to abandon her horse, and down the road comes upon a house, which proves to be deserted. In a closet she finds a dress which she quickly dons and ready to impersonate the mistress. Her fellow messenger has not fared so well, being captured by the enemy, and by a strange stroke of fortune, brought to the house where Nell reigns as mistress. The prisoner is weak from wounds and Nell changes the bandage on his head and in so doing, gains possession of the dispatch hidden beneath the cloth. When Mack is taken away by the enemy, Nell loses no time in taking up her journey to General Grant's Headquarters. She safely passes through the lines, comes upon a Union picket, who conducts her to General Grant. To him she delivers the dispatches and receives congratulations for her bravery. Length, 655 feet.

THE INFERNAL MACHINE.—A banker is sitting in his private office when a crank enters and quickly closes the door behind him. He places a package, which he carries, on the banker's desk, draws a paper mysteriously from his pocket and begins to explain some wildcat scheme. The banker is speechless with amazement, rings for the porter, who ejects the intruder. The banker picks up the morning paper and the first article he reads is one telling of a dangerous crank at large who carries an infernal machine set to go off at 2 o'clock. In terror he inspects the package on his desk and decides to get rid of it without notifying anyone. He stops a minute to leave a message with the teller, then hastily leaves the bank. Two crooks observe his departure and his nervousness, think that he has something valuable in the package and follow, hoping for a chance to hold him up. At the same time a woman comes from a house on the opposite side of the street, carrying a package the exact counterpart of the one carried by the banker. She forgets something, re-enters the house, leaving her package on the steps. The crooks cross the street, steal the package and hurry after the banker. It wants but 15 minutes to 2 o'clock, and the terrified man boards a car for the suburbs. He is driven almost frantic as the different pasengers bump into the package carelessly, finally arrives at a lonely spot in the outskirts where he decides to leave the infernal machine. He looks about, there is no one in sight, so places the box in a vacant lot and hurries away. At a safe distance he turns and looks back, and to his horror sees several children with the package he has just dropped. He yells at them, but they pay no attention and have just opened the package as he reaches them. To his surprise he finds the box filled with delicious fruit. He is overjoyed at this unexpected termination and starts for his office, after giving the children a few pennies. Meantime the two crooks come from the woods carrying the infernal machine still wrapped up. They sit down, start to open it, when it explodes, and the two men disappear in the clouds. Length, 300 feet.

A FALSE ACCUSATION.—A story of paternal devotion. The scene opens in an ill-kept room of a destitute actor, George Ferguson. He is bending over the bed in which his young daughter is lying ill as the postman enters with a letter, which proves to be from a theatrical agency giving him work at a card party that evening. The old actor gets out his dress suit, brushes it carefully, and is about to leave as the doctor comes in, examines his sick child and leaves a perscription. After attending to this and bidding his daughter a fond farewell, Ferguson goes to the house designated in the letter, presents his card, is ushered in and introduced to the guests. Dinner is announced and all sit down to the table. After a while the host takes a diamond from a cabinet and passes it around the table for inspection. During this time, Ferguson, unnoticed, takes different articles of food from the table, putting it in his pocket for the little sick girl at home. The dinner proceeds and the host finally asks for the stone. No one seems to have it or know where it is until it is remembered that Ferguson was the last one to handle it. He stoutly denies any knowledge of its whereabouts and a search which is made fails to reveal it. The ladies are asked to leave the room and after they have gone the men are requsted to turn their pockets inside out. This they will do until it comes Ferguson's turn and he refuses. Naturally, he is suspected and the host rings for officers. When they arrive, the situation is explained and they proceed to search the suspect. In his pockets they find nothing but a few coins and the food taken from the table for the little sick one at home. He is about to be led away by the officers when one of the waiters discovers the stone under a plate. Ferguson breaks down in shame at being found out, but the host apologizes and bids him forget. DIME NOVEL DAN.—In the district messenger office, Dan, with several other boys, are seated on a bench waiting for their turn. Dan is absorbed in a dime novel as the clerk hands him a message with instructions to hurry. Coming out the door, the messenger runs into a man on a step-ladder, upsets him, but continues on his way reading. This headline holds him: "With a wild shriek Blue Feather bit the dust." In his mind's eye Dan sees a child in the foreground playing with her doll. An Indian with a knife between his teeth is creeping upon her. As he rises to his feet and is about to grab the child the boy hero enters at the rear, fires, and the Indian falls dead. Dan walks on, boards a street car still reading, walks over the passengers' feet spellbound in his novel. Another line, 'at that moment Young Daredevil raises his trusty rifle and fired"—a wild landscape, a soldier standing before a huge rock, sword in hand, prepared to sell his life dearly. Six Indians are creeping toward him. They start to rush forward when Young Hero appears, fires one shot and all fall dead. Dan gets off the car, steps in front of a passing automobile and is run over. A crowd rush forward, expecting to find the messenger lifeless, but he gets up and walks off, still reading. Another paragraph reads: "In another moment Black Fox was hurled over the dreadful precipice"—the Boy Hero and an Indian are fighting on the edge of a precipice, the struggle ending by the hero raising the Indian over his head and hurling him over the brink. Again Dan reads: "As our hero realized the fate in store for him, with a mighty effort he burst his bonds"—the hero and the girl are bound to a tree. Indians are dancing about and preparing to burn them. The hero breaks his bonds, seizes an Indian, and using him as a club, knocks the other Indianas down and escapes. Dan finally reaches the house where the message is to be delivered, still reading. The man kicks him down the steps and the messenger sits on the sidewalk to finish the blood-curdling story. Length, 280 feet.

John tries to borrow money from his companion, who is dead broke, then trudges off to the town of Red Dog. He tries to borrow money from the gambling house keeper, who spurns him. A stage coach comes up. Seated on front, with the driver, is the armed messenger of the Wells Fargo Express Company, guarding a small safe full of money. John pleads with the driver, and shows him the telegram. The stage driver will not help him. In despair John places the muzzle of his revolver to his forehead, determined to end his life. Before he can pull the trigger, he sees, in a vision, his sick old mother, rising from her bed, and pleading with him to come back to her. Deeply moved, John puts his revolver away. He sees the Wells Fargo's safe, and makes a desperate resolve. He will get some of the money from that safe and go back to his mother, at any cost. The passengers come out of the hotel and are driven away in the stage. John jumps on behind the stage, and ties a handkerchief over his face, and when the stage reaches a lonely spot, John climbs on top, seizes the gun of the messenger, compels the messenger and driver to jump from the stage, and John drives the stage off. GET 227% INTEREST On Your Investment

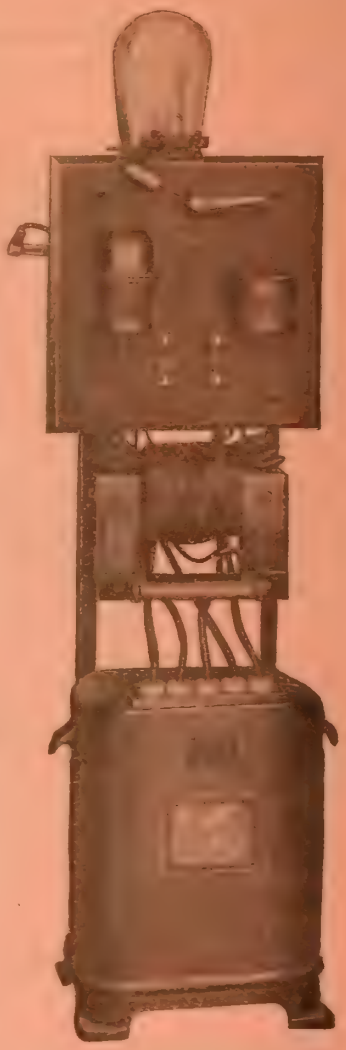
You can if you buy a General Electric Mercury Arc Rectifier for your Moving Picture Theatre instead of rheostats or choke coils.

The Rectifier will take alternating current from the supply circuit and change it to direct current at just the right voltage for the arc. With the Rectifier you do not have any trouble with red-hot rheostats, your incandescent lights do not flicker when you start your arc, and you are not troubled with spots and "ghosts" on the screen. The entire outfit operates smoothly, safely and satisfactorily. Your patrons will be better satisfied because the pictures are better. You will be satisfied because you are actually saving money.



Assume that you operate your lamp 6 hours per day, and that you pay 10c per kw. hour. A glance at the following operating costs will show you just exactly how much you can save in one year:

Direct Current and Rheostat, 26 amps. on the arc	$515.00
Alternating Current and Rectifier, 26 amps. on the arc	375.00
Saved in one year	$140.00
(This is 75% interest on your investment)

Alternating Current and Rheostat, 40 amps. on the arc	$795.00
Alternating Current and Rectifier, 26 amps on the arc	371.00
Saved in one year	$420.00
(This is 227% interest on your investment)

When you buy a General Electric Rectifier, you buy a device that will not only give you better pictures but will actually pay for itself in a short time.

Our nearest office will gladly give you full information regarding the Rectifier.

NOTE—General Electric Rectifiers are fully approved by the Underwriters.

"I Could Yell for Joy"

I am as happy as a big sunflower over the way the exhibitors are receiving the Independent Films from the International Projecting and Producing Company. Today (Tuesday) I saw some more Independent Films run off—a new bunch—and they are screamers, every one! Maybe it isn't very dignified to dance a joy jig in public like this, but who cares a doggone for dignity! If you are not using Independent Films, you're missing the biggest hits of your life and that's absolutely the truth! Get into the band wagon.

ALL INDEPENDENT!

Special to Users of Trust Films: Are you paying your license out of your own pocket? If so, you are not getting a square deal. Most of the licenses are being paid by the licensed renters, instead of the exhibitors, and if your exchange is not paying yours, you are being worked for an easy mark. Read my advertisement. I intend to tell you the straight news of what's going on. Then when you get good and sick of what you are up against, deal with me and forget all about licenses. Dorothy Kirk, a cold, heartless girl, after jilting several suitors, becomes engaged to John Hale. The day of the wedding arrives and Dorothy coolly sends him a note to the effect that it is all off between them. What a blow. The poor fellow's spirit is crushed and he goes the usual route. Lower and lower he sinks until one day, picking up a newspaper, he reads an announcement of the wedding of his old college chum and Dorothy Kirk to take place on that very day. Rushing off to his friend's home he intends to show him her note, but on second thought decides not. However, the friend finds it out, and feigning illness, dispatches John with a note which is identical with the one he himself received some time before. So John unwittingly wreaks vengeance. Length, 997 feet.

RESURRECTION

Free Adaptation of Leo Tolstoy's Powerful Novel.

No literary work has ever enjoyed the popularity of this masterpiece of that celebrated Russian reformer and novelist, Count Leo Tolstoy, with which the reading public of the entire world is familiar. Many adaptations for the stage have been made, but without question this Biograph portrayal is one of the most intense ever given. Never was there such a sermon delivered, nor a succession of thrilling dramatic incidents incorporated in a film subject as in this. Taking the most powerful episodes, it tells the story with an absolute continuity that is wonderful. The staging is typical and elaborate; the acting a revelation of art, and the photographic quality perfect. Aside from this, it presents a moral never before equalled in strength. On the whole, in the art of motion picture productions it reaches the very zenith. Length, 999 feet.

The Making of Signs and Posters for Moving Picture Theaters.

IMPORTANT SERIES OF ARTICLES.

In pursuance of the policy of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD to render its pages of practical value to all interested in the making and exhibition of moving pictures, we announce that next week we shall commence a series of articles on The Making of Signs and Posters for Moving Picture Theaters. These will be written by William J. Sackheim, one of New York's most artistic sign writers. The author, besides being an expert letterer, has the faculty of being able to communicate his knowledge to others, so we have no doubt that the readers of the WORLD will gain much valuable information from his articles.

Mr. Sackheim is well known amongst the exhibitors of New York and other large cities. About ten years ago he started work at Binger's, the largest sign and show card shop in the world. His artistic work made him the proprietor of a large and prosperous sign shop of his own. He next became chief instructor in show card lettering with the Economist Training School of New York. Subsequently he compiled a course of instruction in lettering for the Scranton Correspondence Institute of America. On the completion of this work he returned to New York to conduct a sign business of his own. Mr. Sackheim has originated many novelties for advertising purposes; and he was the first to see the need of artistic signs for penny arcades. With the advent of moving pictures he turned his attention to this class of work, and has painted signs and posters for some of the largest exhibitors of New York. He designs the lettering for the films of the Vitagraph Company of America, and for many large theatrical firms, including Charles Frohman, Klaw & Erlanger, C. W. Dillingham, David Belasco, Wagenhals & Kemfer, the Shuberts and many others.

Mr. Sackheim's articles will appear weekly from our next issue, and we are sure that our readers will find them helpful and instructive.

The Moving Picture as a Brain Rest.

There have been many virtues attributed to the moving picture. Recently it has been called a moral and educational force—something with an uplifting tendency. Then we know that besides merely entertaining and amusing us, it instructs us in history, geography and other things which it is desirable to know. Take it all in all, therefore, the moving picture plays a very valuable part in modern economics. But it has been reserved for Dr. Willis Cummings, New York, N. Y., to assign to the moving picture an office which we had hitherto suspected it of possessing which we did not know it actually enjoyed. Te be brief, Dr. Cummings says that the moving picture may be regarded as a brain rest. His paper on the subject is reprinted this week from the May number of Medical Council, a monthly journal for the physician and surgeon. It will be seen that the doctor associates chess with the moving picture as a brain rest. Those who know anything about the former very beautiful, intellectual game, will, we are assured, agree with us in regarding Dr. Cummings' recommendations as full of wisdom and sound sense.

On purely general grounds we can quite understand the rationale of Dr. Cummings' advice to tired business men to take a dose of moving pictures as a specific for mental fatigue and exhaustion. After all, the brain, like any other part of the body, is liable to become stale from purely physical causes, and we know from experience that by the application of what may be termed a counter-irritant the original disease is either removed or rendered nugatory.

Just consider the case of the tired business man who has been working at hard problems several hours a day, worried by callers, distracted by telephone calls and maddened by the inefficiency of his help. What is his mental state? One of distinct perturbation, restlessness and a general tired feeling. If he goes to a picture show for half an hour or three-quarters, then all the cells of his brain are excited by new physiological sensations: a series of light waves, rapidly impinging on the retina to the accompaniment of an interesting or exciting story. The combination giving the brain something to occupy itself with to the exclusion of other matters. Result: After the visit to the show the man feels rested and refreshed, and comes out better in health for the entertainment.

We are competent neither medically nor surgically to go so deeply into this matter as Dr. Cummings, but our knowledge of optics, physics and physiology quite enable us to appreciate the value of Dr. Cummings' theories and recommendations, and we think that his paper will be regarded by the moving picture field as a most valuable contribution to the literature of the subject and as emphasizing a most important application of the moving picture. But we can go further than this and personally endorse the practical value of Dr. Cummings' advice. Many a time we have gone into a moving picture house both physically and mentally tired. When we have come out the exhilarating effect of the moving story on the screen has, in common parlance, made a new man of us. We have felt better, brighter, clearer headed and far less fatigued for this refreshing change. We think so highly of Dr. Cummings' admirable article that we suggest to the moving picture theater owners, manufacturers, etc., to reprint it and widely circulate it. Then, of course, there is the Patents Company, who might like to do so.

THE USE OF MOVING PICTURES AS A REMEDIAL AGENT.

By Willis Cummings, M.D.

In the consideration of those cases of nerve strain, short of actual breakdown, but with consequent debility, as presented by business men under the stress of present day methods, we look about for means to bring relaxation from the pressure. The conventional prescription directing travel at home or abroad is easy to give, but often hard of application by the patient, who can see no way of leaving business, especially if much is involved or complicated, for an indefinite period ahead.

Unable to leave for the rest that is to be gained by judicious and well-planned travel; not caring for outdoor sports; annoyed by the quality of the plays given in the modern theater, which most certainly do not weigh toward a quiet and serene mental state; perhaps not caring for opera, having enough good music at home, the subject is puzzled and appeals to his medical adviser for suggestion.

In contact with this class of business men, there have been many opportunities for suggestive therapeutics, and among others are two which have been found practically useful. They are the game of chess and the use of moving pictures. The methods are mentioned in conjunction for comparison, and because they have both brought the same results, but only on account of the tempermental conditions of the patients requiring treatment, being studied and appropriate amusement being ordered to suit the individual.

After pointing out the value of the game of chess as a remedy for neurasthenia the author states that the moving picture gains the same end, but by practically opposite lines. It has been ordered in the same cases of tired men, but only where the mental condition or leaning was averse to games of any sort—and there are men who consider it waste of time to indulge in this kind of recreation, but rather singularly will follow up the other, which inferentially might be considered just as wasteful. That is where the temperamental state must be taken into account when ordering this sort of treatment.

After an experimental investigation of the best class of exhibitions, the following deductions have been drawn from my own observations and the reports of patients and others:

Of course, as the general public has to be catered to, it would be impossible to have a collection or series of pictures that would always appeal to or satisfy any individual or the physician as an expert; but in an attendance at any first-class establishment, which will cover a dozen consecutive days, there will be enough of the novel, the educational, the artistic and new delineations to offset the puerile and inane that are given to please those who call for them. I am not sure that these are entirely without value to the cases under discussion.

A man leaves his office for lunch with his head in a whirl; the lunch is bolted and his impulse is to get back to work that nothing may be missed. His head has not stopped working for a moment and his digestion is in no way helped by this condition of mind. Instead of going back to work he drops into the nearest picture place if one is accessible. If rightly conducted it is properly ventilated, clean and not glaringly decorated, the audience is orderly, or kept so by the ushers, hilarity being unrestricted as is applause, boisterousness being suppressed. He settles comfortably into his seat, and no matter how great the tendency to revert to business, his mind will be and is drawn to the photograph on the screen. It is quite likely that there is in the vibratory movement of the picture a tendency to more or less hypnotic effect due to the condition of the observer. At any rate it produces, against the will, desire to stop and look until the end. I have advised that, whenever there is even the slightest sense of having had enough, the patient should come away, that he may not be prevented by satiety from going again.

In well-conducted exhibitions the entertainment lasts from thirty to forty-five minutes, a period sufficiently long to produce relaxation of mind and body. That there is favorable effect is certain. The exact quality of this effect is hard to determine, as it depends much on temperamental conditions; the quantity is appreciable and sometimes, if not regulated, leads to extremes, as in any measure where a constant supervision cannot be undertaken by the physician.

One man said to me: "Doctor, I can not leave the place after I have seen every picture, silly ones and all; but it certainly rests me, as you said it would."

Another man, careworn as to face and manner, goes daily before lunch, as he thinks his food agrees with him better if he can take a little rest before eating. According to physiological laws he is right, and I believe he will get favorable results.

Personal experience has been gained in a measure at an attractive place in one of the busiest streets in New York not far from my office; and it was a matter of surprise to me at first to observe the number of well-groomed and business-looking men who gathered there. The proprietor told me that a number of his patrons, solid men of affairs, frankly said to him that they came there for rest and a mildly stimulative amusement. Evidently they had found that the procedure had brought to them relaxation with but little mental effort. The rapidity of movement in the pictures is not out of keeping with the fervor of the daily life in the commercial section of a large city, where the cases under discussion are oftenest seen.

It appears that the moving pictures shown as a part of the performance in vaudeville and other theaters do not have the same effect—in fact, none at all—as those shown in places devoted to the pictures exclusively. This may be accounted for by the fact that the effort to catch the parts of dialogue, or the speaking parts of performers, the various attempts to produce music, the glare of reflected light, all tend to tire the senses involved, so that when the pictures come at the end, as they usually do, there is a certain sense of tension which inhibits the result wished for, and which condition is not found in the simpler performance.

If this treatment is practical, and so far in a limited way it has been found so, it can be predicted that it would pay an enterprising manager to have a well-furnished, well-organized and artistically equipped place at which quiet and not brazen music might be heard, where the highest grade of pictures the state of art could produce would be shown, where an admission would be charged that would exclude undesirables, thus furnishing rest and pleasure for those who would patronize this amusement with or without the advice of the physician.

It is not unreasonable to assume that hospitals devoted to the care of nervous invalids may, in a not remote future, include this method in their regular equipment; but in the interim it is worth the trial to send overworked men to the show and to chess rather than subject them to worry from prolonged and sometimes illy advised absence from their business.

The Modern Way in Moving Picture Making.

By Thomas Bedding, F. R. P. S.

CHAPTER X.

Toning and Tinting.

The tone, color or tint of a moving picture positive may be produced in three ways: (1) By direct exposure and development; (2) by tinting in a weak solution of aniline dye; (3) by hand or mechanical coloring. The first of these is so little understood by the makers of moving pictures that no doubt it will come to them as a surprise to learn that they have any influence over the tone of a picture. By tone, I mean its color in monochrome—whether it be gray, or "photographic brown," a term which does duty for all sorts of shades between absolutely black and a distinct reddish color. Now how is this color varied? Simply by variation of exposure and deveopment. It is a fundamental axiom in the making of photographic positives by development, either on glass or celluloid, that the longer you expose the sensitive film in contact with the negative the more amenable the picture is, by suitable development, to assume a warmish hue or tone. Thus, when we see an ordinary black and white subject on the screen, we know that the people responsible for this picture have given it normal exposure and development, for a black and white deposit is the normal result of normal treatment. If, on the other hand, we see a grayish, flattish picture, why then they have gone to the other extreme and over exposed it, or under exposed it and over developed it. I want to drive home the lesson as forcibly as possible that the positive and its colorific appearance are entirely within the control of the operator.

Now supposing that we want to vary this cold black of the picture on the screen, how is it to be done? In a very simple manner. By doubling, tripling, quadrupling the exposure by a suitable alteration of the printing light, and using the ordinary developer, we see a distinct change in the color of the deposit, a change which leans towards red. Very often a picture which looks visually unsuitable for projection, gives a most pleasing picture on the screen. So that a few experiments will be necessary to arrive at satisfactory results.

Only this week I saw some of Messrs. Pathe's pictures which had obviously been toned in development by this method. They were of a pleasing delicate warm sepia, and most agreeable to look on, and artistically and æsthetically satisfactory. I believe I am correct in saying that this is the first time this simple principle of toning or coloring the deposit of moving picture film has been dealt with in the periodical literature on the subject.

Tinting, of course, is another matter. Here you tint your entire picture either red, blue, green or yellow by means of an aqueous or alcoholic solution of an aniline dye. Simply dissolve the dye in water or alcohol to the desired tint, then immerse the film in it until the tint on it is of the depth required. There are no elaborate instructions required for this simple operation. The thing is easily done. The most important consideration is that the tint chosen should match the subject, which it rarely does in moving picture films.

Burroughs, Welcome & Co., in their excellent little photographic handbooks, give the following particulars and formulæ for the tinting of prints and lantern slides. The same instructions are applicable to moving picture films: Many striking and original color effects may be obtained by immersing lantern slides, bromide, platinotype and similar prints in solutions of suitable aniline dyes. Portraits, fireside and forge studies may be stained red; moonlight effects blue, and sunlit landscapes and street scenes green or orange, with marked success. For this purpose solutions made from certain "Soloid" stains are very convenient. For orange, use "Soloid" Eosin; for red, "Soloid" Fuchsine; for violet, "Soloid" Gentian Violet or "Soloid" Methyl Violet; and for blue, "Soloid" Methylene Blue. The exact strength depends on the depth of tint desired; it is therefore advisable to make a solution of one product in five ounces of water, and to dilute this according to requirements. For yellow, use "Soloid" Methyl Orange, one in an ounce of water. For green, "Tabloid" Aniline Green Dye may be used. Dissolve one in a pint of hot water for stock, and dilute this according to strength of stain required. Soak prints in water until flaccid, immerse in the dye solution for a few minutes, rinse and dry in the usual way.

I spoke above about toning by development. "Toning" as it is more freely understood means the deposition on the subject of some other substance which will change its color; in other words, it is a kind of chemical gilding or coloring. There are several ways of getting rich green, red, blue and other colors by the deposition method which are not generally known amongst moving picture workers. The following methods are quoted by F. Martin Duncan, F. R. P. S., in the London Bioscope. They are old and well-tried methods which have stood the test of practical experience, and I can recommend them to the moving picture worker. I make no apology for quoting Mr. Duncan's instructions verbatim et literatim.

Sepias and Browns.

There is much to be said in favor of the sulphide method of toning, for very charming sepias, browns, and ruddy tints may be obtained with it. When it is possible to work the process right away from the printing and developing rooms, it is well worth at least a good trial. The print, after being thoroughly washed to free it from all traces of the hypo bath, is placed in the following bath until the image is quite bleached:

Bleaching Bath.

Ammonium Bromide	300 grains.
Potass. Ferricyanide	300 grains.
Water	20 oz.

This bath can be used over and over again until the bleaching action begins to grow very slow.

After bleaching, wash for a few minutes and tone in the following bath:

Sulphide Bath.

Pure Sodium Sulphide	100 grains.

This bath must not be stored after use.

When the print has thoroughly darkened, which will take about three to five minutes, it is thoroughly washed for at least half an hour in running water. This sulphide toner tends to somewhat increase the density of the print, so it is important when making a print that is to be subsequently treated by this process to keep it just the least bit thin.

Another method of obtaining dark, warm brown tones is to bleach the print in a saturated solution of mercuric chloride, then rinse in a strong solution of common salt, and then transfer to a bath composed of:

Soda Hyposulphite	10 grains.
Water	20 oz.

until the print is dark enough. Then thoroughly wash to rid of all trace of hypo.

A very pleasing range of tones may be obtained by the copper process, which gives a range of colors from a rich brownish black to a rosy red, according to the length of time allowed for the print to remain in the bath. The following solutions must be made up:

Solution I.

Copper Sulphate	1 oz.
Water	10 oz

Solution II.

Potass. Citrate	1 oz.
Water	10 oz.

Solution III.

Potass. Ferricyanide	1 oz.
Water	10 oz.

For use, take 1 oz. Solution I., 8 oz. Solution II., and 7 drams of Solution III. When the desired tone has been reached, the print is removed from the toning bath and washed.

Another method of obtaining a red tone is by treating a beached print with a solution of Schlippe's salt. It is very important that the print has been thoroughly well washed to free it from all traces of hypo. The print is then placed in the following bleaching bath, in which it is allowed to remain until it is quite bleached:

Bleaching Bath.

Potass. Bichromate	200 grains.
Hydrochloric Acid	40 minims.
Water	20 oz.

It is then well washed and transferred to the Darkening Bath.

Schlippe's Salt	300 grains.
Water	20 oz.

After darkening in the above bath, the print is again thoroughly washed. In place of the bichromate bleacher, a solution of iodine in potass. iodide, of a dark showy color, may be used.

A good green tone is much more difficult to obtain, and certainly so far a bath in which vanadium chloride is used as one of the constituents has yielded the finest results. The formula for the bath is given below, and it is important in compounding it to follow out the instructions given:

Vanadium Green Tone Bath.

Vanadium Chloride	20 grains.
Ferric Chloride	10 grains.
Ferric Oxalate	10 grains.
Potass. Ferricyanide	20 grains.
Oxalic Acid (Saturated Solution)	2½ oz.
Water to	20 oz.

The vanadium chloride must first be dissolved in hot hydrochloric acid and a little water. The ferric chloride and ferric oxalate are added to the oxalic acid solution, diluted with half the total amount of water. The potass. ferricyanide is dissolved in the remaining 10 oz. of water, and when thoroughly dissolved added to the ferric chloride and oxalate solution, taking care to well stir the solution so as to thoroughly mix, and finally the vanadium chloride is added. The print must be left in the vanadium bath until it turns blue, and then removed and washed until it turns green. The great drawback is the cost of the vanadium.

Another method of producing a green tone is as follows: First soak the print for three to five minutes, or longer, according to the color desired, in a bath composed of:

Potass. Bichromate	100 grains.
Potass. Ferricyanide	500 grains.
Water	20 oz.

Then wash free from the bichromate stain and tone in:

Cobalt Chloride	400 grains.
Ferrous Sulphate	100 grains.
Hydrochloric Acid	400 grains.
Water	20 oz.

Wash briefly and fix in an acid hypo bath, giving a final wash to eliminate the hypo. The depth of color depends upon the length of time that the print is left in the bichromate bath.

A really fine deep blue, for moonlight and sea effects, can be readily obtained with the aid of the following bath:

Blue Bath.

Ferric Ammonium Citrate, 10 per cent. solution	2 oz.
Potass. Ferricyanide, 10 per cent. solution	2 oz.
Acetic Acid, 10 per cent. solution	20 oz.

Allow the print to remain in this bath until the desired depth of color is obtained, and then wash until the high lights are cleared from yellow stain. The addition of a weak solution of hydrochloric acid to the above bath brightens the tone considerably; and a weak solution of hypo instead of hydrochloric acid gives a brighter tone still. As the density of the print is nearly doubled by this process it is advisable to slightly under develop the print. It is possible to convert the color of a print that has been toned in the above bath from blue to green. The print is first toned in the Blue Bath, given above, and then washed and transferred to a bath composed of Chromic Acid	90 grains.

in which it is allowed to remain until it changes to a uniform green, when it is removed and washed.

These proportions and quantities can, of course, be increased at will. Hand coloring and other branches of the subject must form the subject of another article.

OBSERVATIONS BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

It was a little dull during the past week. I mean by this that there was very little noise in the motion picture field. The patents proteges have had nothing to say. They are doing a powerful lot of thinking. The Independents have also been somewhat quiet, although not as silent as some of the other fellows. Taking all in all, the present situation is the most remarkable in the history of the business. The suspense is terrible. Why doesn't somebody move and end it! On the one hand we hear the same old cry of the Motion Picture Patents Company: "We have you on the patents, and you 'dasen't'——" On the other we hear the retort: "Your patents claims are wind, and you can't——"

When one sits down and calmly reviews the situation it appears ludicrous, no matter what point of view is taken. One party claims possession of the earth but makes no move towards shoving the other fellow off. The opposition yells itself hoarse to convince the public that the patent claims do not amount to shucks, and yet spends thousands of dollars in demonstrating to the public that it has something in hand "that does not infringe." To tell the truth, it looks very much like a fear to move on one hand and a hedging game on the other. The general belief is that the patents claims do not hinge so much upon the projecting apparatus as upon the film. If such is the case why is it that so many manufacturers are allowed to spring up in so many parts of the United States without the slightest molestation on the part of the patents claimants? There are more one-horse film manufacurers in this country to-day than the combined number of foreign and domestic regulars. Their existence is well known in all quarters and ignorance on that score cannot be pleaded. Why the immunity? The complexion of affairs seems to favor the Independents. They are getting plenty of films through imports and promise to soon begin manufacturing subjects right on the enemy's grounds. If they are at all apprehensive it appears to be confined to the method of projection, and they have shown foresight in looking about for a projecting apparatus that does not infringe upon the Patents Company claims. Whether or not they have secured it is not within the province of this writing. It is perfectly proper to say, however, that there is more activity shown on the part of the Independents than on the other side.

The exhibiting business is falling off considerably in all the cities and large towns. The effect is felt more among the licensed people than the Independents. The reason is obvious. This is the first season that the latter have waged a war that has been felt; one that even the most sanguine of the opposition have been forced to admit has shown strength and accomplishment. Last year the cry was that if the Biograph Company and the Gaumont Company were absorbed and taken from the independent field there would soon be no Independents. The hope that such a combination would be effected lessened the effect of what the Independents did at that time and the belief that they were doomed to eventual annihilation by a master-stroke made the sufferers content to stand losses. But look at the situation to-day! The long-hoped-for consolidation was effected and the Independents are stronger now than they ever were. It is a safe bet that more than one of the manufacturers under the licensed proposition would like to kick holes into the fellow who framed up the Patents Company scheme.

Somebody asked the other day why the licensed manufacturers should kick on the Patents Company game and added another question as to whether the two dollars per week that the exhibitors were paying as royalties was not sufficient to repay them? That is all very well from the exhibitor's standpoint, but the royalty business is a knocker to the licensed exchanges, many of whom are actually paying the royalties out of their own pockets and in consequence are unable to spend as much money for subjects as they did a year ago. Taking the matter in this light the royalty proposition is a boomerang to the manufacturers, and is much more so by reason of the desertions to the independent ranks of exhibitors who opposed paying and would not permit others to pay for them the royalty fee imposed.

Go where you will and the chief complaint made against the Patents Company is based on the license proposition. The man who is not paying asks you "Why should I pay it?" The man who is paying asks "What am I getting for it?"

Thus far the only answer the man who pays has received sounds like this: "You can show our make of films without fear of molestation. If you do not take out a license we will take out of your place any of our films that you show." Then the man who pays says: "But my competitors are running both kinds of films—independent and licensed. If I run independent films you will take my license from me; if he gives up independent films you will give him a license. Now, where do I come in? By being a good boy I bring you a new customer at $2 per week."

Emissaries of the Independent faction have been busy in the licensed field the past two weeks, and if the Patents people do not show more energy and decisive action very soon the opposition will have the exhibitors now taking licensed films in such a mood that by the time the Fall and Winter season opens most of the licensed exchanges will be awaiting tenants. Some very strong arguments and glowing promises are made and they are having effect. Special pains are being taken to impress upon the exhibitors that, so far as they are concerned, the only question for them to consider bears on the surplus of receipts over expenses. The emissaries have a new plan. They do not ask the licensed exhibitors to throw their present service, but simply hold themselves in readiness to take up a good proposition under a full guarantee of protection. What the proposition is likely to be has not been stated. It has been intimated that a certain projecting apparatus, which, it is claimed, is absolutely clear of any outside patents claims, will be furnished the exhibitors and bonded protection will be given them against any suits for infringement as to the films.

This plan of campaign savors so much of conservative and fair impulse it commands attention. If some of the organs that aspire to be the mouth-pieces of the Independents could have some of the same spirit injected into them their utterances would receive more consideration. The bitterness and personal aggressiveness displayed by them can do no cause any good. It is not a question as to what this or that individual says or does. The situation is based entirely upon the question of right or wrong. Individual character or action has no bearing upon the matter. There are two classes involved—the Patents people and the Independents. For the latter to call the former monopolists and trust bugs is like the pot calling the kettle a blackface. All know that the Independents are combined as well as the Patents people, and each is trying to crowd the other out of the field. The one advantage the Independents have in argument is, that they have not imposed upon the exhibitors a royalty based upon claims which have not been sustained. At the same time it must be conceded that the claims have not been prosecuted. For this the Patents Company has laid itself open to censure and criticism, but there is absolutely no occasion for blackguardism. The inactivity of the Patents Company reflects upon it. Hundreds of exhibitors who were led to believe that by paying the royalty they were to secure substantial protection through the enforcement of patent claims naturally feel embittered, but it should be remembered that these exhibitors have the right to renounce the license at any time, which no doubt most of them will do if the Patents Company does not soon show something. If it cannot make good, if its patents will not stand the test, then royalties should not be imposed. If the contrary is the case, then the people who are paying the royalties should be accorded all the benefits that enforcement of claims upon which the royalties are paid can bring. So long as the company requires the payment of royalties it is at least morally bound to enforce its patents.

POOR OPERATORS.

In going about from theater to theater one cannot but be struck with the difference in the management of the machine. If the film is run faster than the camera when the exposure was made the figures move with a jerky action which spoils the whole effect. On the other hand, if the machine is turned slower than the camera the opposite condition prevails.

Generally the operators run their machines too fast rather than too slow, and the effects of the best films are spoiled. The writer was in a theater a few nights ago where the operator ran his machine at race horse speed and the figures moved like puppets set on huge springs. It was almost impossible to see them change they moved so fast, and it was impossible to follow the stories of the pictures with any degree of satisfaction.

Managers should attend to such details as this and see that the operators run their machines at the correct speed. It is useless to ruin good pictures with poor operating. Far better get in one less programme and have patrons all satisfied than to spoil the pictures and have them leave before the show is half over, as was the case in that theater. This criticism applies with more or less force everywhere and every manager should see that his machines are operated at the proper speed.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

The publication of Mr. De Witt C. Wheeler's letter in another part of this week's World, enables me to correct an error in which I fell last week when writing of the antiquity of song slides. I first heard these exactly 30 years ago at the Polytechnic Institution, London, where the finest hand-colored slides were shown, exhibited and sung to. This antedates Mr. Meyer Cohen's record by 10 years. The song slide is probably older than 30 years. At any rate Mr. Wheeler may be assured that there is nothing to be gained by haggling over small points of history of which he knows far less than I do.

Where, however, I freely give him best, is in the making of beautifully colored song slides from good photographic negatives. As I sat, on Monday last, and admired his slides illustrating the old story of an amorous couple fondling one another on the moon-lit sea-shore (I plead guilty to having done that sort of thing myself, my only sorrow is that the prosaicalities of life oblige me to relegate love making to the things that were) I could not help feeling surprised that he should go to the trouble of writing to defend himself from attacks which obviously pass over his head, for Wheeler makes good slides and people seem to like them, so it is clear he has a market for them.

These opinions may not favor Mr. Wheeler's business, but I cannot help that. He must bow to the ordinary laws of supply and demand. He must also allow people, who are as well qualified as himself, to express an opinion without calling them names.

If I had been in Mr. Wheeler's place, I would have endeavored to profit by the remarks that he criticised. I would have doubled my advertising space, and taken my stand on quality, which Mr. Wheeler is perfectly well entitled to do, because, as I have said, he makes excellent slides. I certainly would not have given myself away in the absurd fashion, which he unconsciously does.

After calling me many unnecessarily foolish names he makes the melancholy admission that he is absolutely dependent upon the publisher for his material. It is about time that Mr. Wheeler started in business properly and made his own choice of theme of music. Good music and good verses are had comparatively cheap. There is any amount of it floating round about Thirty-fourth street and other parts of this city, and I am surprised that Mr. Wheeler does not take advantage of this fact.

It is a good many years since I started making lantern slides; I have judged thousands of them; I have awarded scores and scores of prizes. The finest lantern slide makers in the world, namely Frederick York; William Brooks; G. W. Wilson; P. H. Fincham, and Valentine of Dundee deferred to my judgment in lantern slide matters. Many years ago, the Society of Arts in London officially testified to my artistic knowledge. I have written more verses and songs than probably Mr. Wheeler has made lantern slides.

So I am quite content to leave it to your readers to decide whether the opinions I have expressed are fair and reasonable, as they are qualified by experience, or whether they deserve the criticisms of Mr. Wheeler, whose name does not strike me as being a very old one in photographic matters. His ability, however, is not open to doubt.

Moreover my only object in writing about song slides is to assist in promoting a higher level of excellence amongst them. Personally, I think I ought to have Mr. Wheeler with me rather than, as it seems to be the case, against me.

NOTES OF THE TRADE.

The Vitagraph Company will shortly release an elaborate film on the Life of George Washington—a double reel.

Biograph Company is the new corporate name of the American Mutoscope & Biograph Company, the change being only made for brevity.

The Globe Film Service Co. are now located at new quarters, 107 E. Madison St., Chicago, where they will be pleased to meet their customers, friends and the film trade in general.

Mr. Joseph Joel, the well known lecturer, is with Mr Frederick Gross' Cosey Corner Moving Picture Parlor, Brooklyn, and makes a hit with his clever explanations of the pictures.

MEETING OF LICENSED MANUFACTURERS.

A meeting of the licensed manufacturers was held in the rooms of the Motion Picture Patents Company on Thursday and Friday, May 13th and 14th. There was a full attendance, and all expressed their satisfaction with the progress made by the Patents Company in establishing reforms that are already having a beneficial effect on the business.

The work of the Board of Censorship was highly commended and met with the hearty accord of all the manufacturers.

Mr. George Kleine, who had just returned from an extended trip, in which he visited all the distributing points west of Chicago, reported that conditions were very much improved, the business of the licensed exchanges had increased and there was a general feeling of satisfaction with the licensed service and the run of old film rapidly diminishing.

One thing which came up for discussion was the reports that licensed exchanges, to save themselves from carrying a full line, depend upon borrowing from each other if calls are made upon them for certain subjects which they do not buy. If the exchange who has this subject happens to have it on circuit, of course the exhibitor is deprived in many cases from showing subjects of his choice. The Patents Company will take steps to regulate this evil.

Mitchell's Film Exchange, Little Rock, Ark., was granted a branch office at Memphis, Tenn.

The following exchange licenses were cancelled:

Schiller Film Exchange, Chicago.

U. S. Film Exchange, Chicago.

Star Film Exchange, Chicago.

American Film Exchange, Memphis, Tenn.

The complaint against the Schiller, Star and American was failure to observe their agreement, and in the case of the Schiller exchanging films with other offices and lack of co-operation with the Patents Company.

The Star was charged with renting licensed films to unlicensed theatres and failure to make a fixed penalty for a first offense, which had come up before an earlier meeting.

The manufacturers are still in session as this paper goes to press.

NEW LICENSED MANUFACTURERS.

All that was left of Bachman's Film Business has been taken over by the newly incorporated Progressive Motion Picture Company. The latter firm is capitalized for $25,000 and is established in Ogden, Utah. The line of work turned out thus far by this concern has been highly meritorious, some of their subjects typical of Western life being unexcelled. The Progressive Motion Picture Company is licensed by the Motion Picture Patents Company, and has every qualification for immediate success.

The Patents Company and the Mayor.

Pursuing their policy of influencing the authorities in their attitude towards motion pictures, the Patents Company invited Mayor McClellan to attend an exhibition at the Company's offices. The invitation concluded as follows:

"This Company recognizes the eminent service you have done for the citizens of this city in suppressing objectionable conditions in connection with the motion picture business, and we wish to place on record our appreciation of your attitude and our desire to co-operate with you in your determination to uplift this form of popular amusement.

"The Motion Picture Patents Company realizes that the motion picture business must be conducted on a high plane; hence we have collaborated in the establishment of a Board of Censorship consisting of representatives of the Board of Education, church societies, the Society for the Prevention of Crime, the People's Institute, and the licensed manufacturers, which inspects every new film before it is released to licensed exhibitors.

"Every objectionable subject is promptly pruned out and the film destroyed, thus insuring motion pictures of an educational, moral, and cleanly amusing type and sealing the doom of suggestive subjects, or those which might have a harmful effect on the minds of the young. This, we believe, is one reform on which you laid great stress.

"This Board of Censorship began operations on March 26, 1909, and already about two hundred thousand feet or 38 miles of film have been inspected, and it will be but a short time before the entire stock now in use all over the country will be of an approved type.

"This Company, in further carrying out your ideas, has established a department of inspection whose duty it is to see that all theaters are safe, well ventilated, clean and light. We will not license a theater if we find that it is not strictly within the law as to fire safety and sanitation. This is naturally apart from all municipal inspection, but we are ready and will be glad to co-operate with all municipal departments in every way.

"The exhibition of our new lighting system marks a revolution in the motion picture business. The nature of these shows has heretofore required a dark theater, with all its attendant evils. By the use of this device, theaters can now be kept brightly lighted with only the stage in semi-darkness. Not only do we intend that all our licensees shall use this device, but we would cheerfully acquiesce if your Honor made it a condition in the granting of every motion picture license in this city, that the theater be kept lighted during all the performances.

"And in this respect we would like to lay emphasis on the fact that this new lighting device is not a patent controlled by this Company, but free to all, and can be installed at very slight expense. Our object in perfecting it was to better the condition of the motion picture business and to co-operate with you in your effort to rid it of abuses that merited criticism.

"The Motion Picture Patents Company is glad to go on record in thanking you for the impetus you have given the movement looking toward the betterment of conditions, not only here, but throughout the country, for other cities are prompt to follow New York's lead in matters of this kind.

"We intend to lend you all co-operation, and to work in the utmost harmony with all the departments of the city government.

"And we sincerely hope that you can spare the time to witness our exhibition, and to see the reforms we have brought about for which we give you full credit."

THE BOARD OF CENSORSHIP.

The National Board of Censorship which has, since March 26, passed upon the entire output of the principal film manufacturers of the world, is now confronted with a situation that threatens to hamper its future activities.

The Motion Picture Patents Company, licensing most of the American and about 90 per cent. of the European film makers, has worked hand in hand with the Board of Censorship, and has not only submitted to them all of its films, averaging 18,000 feet per week, but has equipped an exhibition room in its own offices, where the films are shown as soon as they are received from the factories. Not a single film is allowed to reach the exchanges for distribution among the 6,000 licensed theaters throughout the United States until it has been examined and officially approved by the Censorship Board.

So far this arrangement has worked admirably. Complaints about undesirable pictures have almost entirely ceased, and there has been a marked improvement in the films as they come from the manufacturers, so that recently the Censorship Board has found very little indeed to criticise. But there are still some films of European make that do not come under the license of the Patents Company, and which are used in about two thousand theaters in the United States.

Up to the present time the Board of Censorship has been unable to reach an agreement with the men who control these unlicensed films except in the city of New York.

In so far as New York is concerned, everything has worked smoothly between the Censors and the unlicensed film users, but in order to make the movement national in scope it is absolutely necessary that the unlicensed firms shall agree to submit all of their output to the Censorship Board.

The necessity of such co-operation is obvious.

If the Board of Censorship whose personnel includes members of the Society for Prevention of Crime, Board of Education, church society, etc., men and women of such stamp and calibre as to merit the confidence of the most exacting moralists, are able to control the entire film production of both licensed and unlicensed makers and importers, its work will cover the entire country and its decision will be final.

In that case there will be no need of local Censorship Boards, which have already sprung up in various parts of the country, and which re-examine films that have already been passed by the National Board.

On the other hand, if an occasional undesirable film, the output of some company that has not submitted its films to the National Board, shall be shown, an immediate outcry will be raised against "indecent motion pictures" with the probable result that a local Censorship Board will be formed, either by the police or civic authorities.

Such local Censors are apt to go to extremes, and to work so drastically as to not only harm the picture business in their own localities, but to cause great loss to the renters through the rejection or mutilation of their films.

Unless the work of the National Censorship Board can be made unlimited and truly national, much of the good work that has already been accomplished through weeks of conscientious and efficient labor, will be undone.

There is lots of room and a just demand for local Censorship Boards that will deal with the conditions of the theaters in which pictures are shown. Ventilation, lighting, safety and sanitation are far more important right now than the pictures, and local boards could do much toward bettering such conditions, but the actual censoring of the pictures themselves should be left entirely to the intelligent and splendidly qualified National Board, whose work thus far has been most meritorious.

DO YOU KNOW

THAT two hundred and fifty thousand (250,000) people visit motion picture theaters in New York City every weekday?

THAT five hundred thousand (500,000) people visit motion picture theaters every Sunday?

THAT there are now only half as many motion picture theaters in New York City as there were last December?

THAT there are six thousand (6,000) licensed motion picture theaters in the United States and only two thousand (2,000) unlicensed?

THAT there are now almost a thousand more licensed theaters in the United States than there were three months ago?

THAT Chicago spends forty thousand dollars ($40,000) a day in motion picture theaters?

THAT Chicago will have, at the present rate of increase, five hundred (500) motion picture theaters before the end of the present year?

THAT the motion picture business in the United States represents invested capital of over fifty million dollars ($50,000,00)?

THAT Close to four million dollars ($4,000,000) is taken in daily by the motion picture theaters of the United States?

THAT Mexico, Central and South America, the Panama Canal Zone and Canada also have numerous and prosperous motion picture theaters?

THAT the Board of Censorship has examined almost fifty (50) miles of film in the exhibition rooms of the Motion Picture Patents Company?

THAT when you look at one reel of average length you see about fourteen (14) separate pictures every second, and about seventeen thousand (17,000) pictures all told?

THAT by a simple arrangement motion picture theaters may be kept brightly lighted without in the least degree damaging the pictures on the screen?

THAT the light theater is one of the most desirable changes that can be made toward the elevation of the motion picture business?

THAT a light theater almost wipes out the chances of panic, and is the surest possible check to rowdyism?

THAT fire and accident insurance can now be procured for any and all licensed motion picture theaters?

Do you know all of these interesting facts?

FILM MANUFACTURERS ENJOINED.

Proof of the determination of the Motion Picture Patents Company to protect its holdings was shown in an announcement made this week to the effect that suit had been filed in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia against the Oklahoma National Mutoscene Company. The Mutoscene Company has offices in Washington, and makes and sells motion pictures.

Positive evidence has been obtained that the camera used by the Mutoscene Company is an infringement of the Edison camera patent, the validity of which has been sustained by the New York Court of Appeals.

The Mutoscene Company will at once be enjoined from further infringement, and will no doubt be obliged to pay heavy damages. From this and many similar actions it is made clear that the Patents Company will defend its rights to the fullest extent of the law, and will be most vigorous in its prosecutions.

The Henry B. Ingram Company has just issued a new set of slides for Bernard J. Clarke's new song, "Last Night." The photography is sharp and clear and the slides pretty. They are being used on the Keith & Proctor circuits.

Notable Film of the Week.

The Hunter's Grief (Pathe).

The practised hand of a Parisian producer is visible in every movement, every detail of this very fine film, which, after a careful inspection of the other releases shown at the moment of writing, we unhesitatingly pronounce to be the outstanding picture of the week. The actors and actresses act. There is not, in the current locution of the stage, a single "stick" in the cast. This is, of course, to be expected when a member of the Academie Francaise assumes responsibility for the production. In many respects the story is about the most original that we have recently seen on the silent stage, and allowing for the obviously excessive amount of sentiment, which, according to Anglo-Saxon audiences, permeates all French dramas, we imagine that this piece will be very popular with moving picture audiences in this country. Then again, the story is clearly told and sets forth a way in which a very difficult psychological problem might be solved. A sportsman accidentally shoots his own child, goes insane with grief on discovering what he has done, is confined in a sanitarium for six years, and emerges from it, presumably cured, to find that while he has been away another son of which he is the father has been born to him, has grown up, strongly resembles the dead child, and to all intents and purposes takes his place. Peace comes to the stricken man, when in company with his wife and second child, he weeps out his grief over the grave of the lost little one. A truly characteristic French touch.

Now here is an intensely dramatic theme, and it is really wonderful to see with what supreme command of histrionic art the actors and actresses playing in the piece convey the varying emotions felt in that piece to the audience. Not a single point is lost, there is not a single moment's pause or obscurity. From the instant the curtain goes up the shadow of fate seems to hang over the little fellow who is doomed to die at the hands of his father. He is seen to be playing with a gun, and, when after the party have set out for the hunt, he surreptitiously escapes from the window to follow them, we have a still further premonition of his fate. The tragic moment of the play is when he is accidentally shot by his father. From thence on, through the powerful scene in the house where the parent gradually develops insanity amidst the grief of his family and has to be taken away, we rise to the loftiest height of tragic power yet seen on the moving picture stage. The remainder of the story which we have described is in the nature of a final chapter leading up to a happy denouement.

The dramatist is to be congratulated on the invention of the second child, although the probabilities are perhaps somewhat strained, but if we always expect probabilities in a moving picture play or in any other kind of play, there would be very few plays produced.

American film manufacturers are constantly threatening that their films will shortly reach the Pathe standard of quality. They have been threatening a long time. Let them get busy and carry out the threat. The picture we are discussing is an object lesson. It offers a clear, intelligible story, it is perfectly acted, which is what we might expect from eminent French artists, while the scenic details of the mounting and costumes, etc., the entire stage production, in fact, are faultless. And then the photographic part of the work has been carefully, conscientiously and sympathetically carried out. The picture is accurately exposed, and the various tones and colors of the positive harmonize with the richness of the original scenes. Better work of the kind could not be produced. Yes, "The Hunter's Grief" is the notable film of this week. The other pictures between which it was sandwiched on the occasion of our inspection of it were a long way behind it in all points, and at the present rate of progress it will be a long, long time before they are up to it.

RALEIGH & ROBERT BURNED OUT.

The factory and studio of Raleih & Robert, Avenue du Roule, at Neuilly, near Paris, France, has been reduced to ashes by a fire which started in the finishing room. The films on the working benches took fire, communicating the flames to the different workshops, stores and theater. Most of the stored and finished films have been saved and no accident is reported. At the news of the disaster, the firms of Pathe Freres, Gaumont, Eclair and Lux spontaneously and gratuitously placed their factories at the disposition of Raleigh & Robert, who appreciate highly this proof of sympathy and are now in a position to resume the making of their copies. A strange irony of this disaster is that the flames started in the very shop where women were finishing a film representing the blazing oil stores at the railroad station Du Landy.

THE BRAYTON BABY SHOW SCHEME.

"There is only one beautiful baby in the world and every mother has it," so every mother says, and she is an authority from whom there is no appeal. The Brayton Company of Chicago are alive to these facts, and they know the value of a baby as an advertising medium for the moving picture theater. Women and children make up a large part of the audiences of these places, and baby therefore is sure of special attention whenever he appears on the screen.

Come to think of it, baby appears with conspicuous infrequency on the moving picture screen, one of our writers two weeks ago said, and he might be made more use of. That writer is right. So is the Brayton Manufacturing Company. What they do is to organize a baby show in connection with moving picture theaters, and offer prizes to the successful contestant. But you do not have to send your baby to the theater, you simply send his photograph. That photograph is shown on the screen, and the votes of the audience decide who is the winner.

The Brayton Company, 120 East Randolph street, Chicago, will send particulars to any exhibitor who wishes to adopt this novel scheme of interesting their audiences.

NEW LICENSED EXCHANGE FOR UPPER NEW YORK STATE.

A. C. Hayman, who reecntly sold out his interest in the Actograph Company and was granted a license to open another exchange, writes us from Syracuse that he has found an ideal location in that city. He says:

"The conditions as I have found them in Syracuse and vicinity for a first-class license rental exchange conducted on the best business principles, are most favorable. Personally I feel under great obligations to the officers of the Patents Company for granting the only license in Syracuse for an exchange located as ours will be, in the heart of a most wonderful field.

"I have secured the most desirable location in the city for our offices which will occupy the entire second floor of 427 South Salina street. The exhibitors throughout the territory canvassed by me, seemed very well pleased at the prospect of having near at hand a license exchange that could serve them with those high-class films, without which they have found it difficult to successfully conduct their houses.

"We intend to carry the largest stock of machines, supplies and accessories, outside of New York City. We have been offered the sales agency for many specialties in the business and will have a number of surprises to spring on the moving picture trade. MOTION PICTURE SERVICE CO.,

NEW YORK MOTION PICTURE COMPANY.

The invitation of the New York Motion Picture Company to look at their first productions, came to us as we are going to press and for this reason we have not the time to give a full description of "Disinherited Son's Loyalty" and "Romance of a Fishermaid" to be released on May 21 and 28. These two films are very creditable for a first attempt, in fact they are above the average of manufacturers who have been in the business for several years. The stories are well told, well acted with some good photography and some fine scenic effects. They show much care and attention on the part of the producers and if the New York Motion Picture Company persevere in their efforts, they will soon enjoy an enviable reputation amongst the leading American manufacturers of the Independent camp. We wish them all the success they deserve.

NEW AMERICAN FILM PRODUCER.

The Carson Company, with factories in Philadelphia and New York and offices at 1402 Broadway, New York City, is a new company that has been quietly at work for the past three months. They seem to have started out on the right track, and, with unlimited capital equipped themselves with up-to-date apparatus and engaged the best talent and employed actors from the upper Broadway theaters; people who command high salaries and who have never before taken part in moving picture productions. They have now six subjects ahead and the general manager of the concern, Mr. Geo. F. Carson, is visiting the exchanges to find out to what extent they will support an American producer of strictly high class subjects. We were shown a small section of their first release, "With Grant," which will be issued on May 20, and without making any comparisons must say that in photography and action the work takes a stand which means their assured success if that standard is maintained. The program of this new company is to release one reel a week of pictures that are as good, if not better, than the best that is now made in the whole world, and as they seem to have the determination and ability to produce pictures that will satisfy the most critical we will watch their career with interest. The demand for American subjects for independent exhibitors seems to be on the eve of ample fulfilment, as no less than twelve producers are now at work in this country.

A FILM STEADIER.

The newest device for improving the moving picture is a film steadier which can be attached to any picture machine. It does away with the jumping and unsteadiness of the picture, and, consequently, should remove a common complaint about the moving picture injudiciously affecting the eye. No jumpiness, no eye strain, no headache. Remove the cause, the effect will cease. The film steadier puts the film under perfect tension. It consists essentially of a soft pliable rubber roller that holds the film back in one direction, and makes it pull firm one way all the time. It, therefore, has obvious advantages over the hard metal tension springs which do not prevent a certain amount of play of the film, which, when magnified on the screen, produces the effect of quivering and jumpiness. The film steadier, therefore, appeals to every exhibitor, and we have no doubt that it will be generally approved when tried out to do what is claimed for it. We therefore recommend every exhibitor to give it a trial. The film steadier is manufactured by the Chicago Flm Exchange, 46-50 Jackson Boulevard, Chicago, Ill., and sold exclusively by them and their branch offices.

LAEMMLE ENTERS THE SONG SLIDE FIELD.

The moving picture field has been startled by the announcement that Laemmle has entered the music business. The music publishing house of Laemmle's at Chicago started in with a catalogue of new songs, under the management of Homer Howard, and the departure has met with great success.

From music to song slides is a natural step. The song slide has already attracted great attention in our pages. It has been criticised, attacked and defended. The consensus of opinion is, that the song slide is not what it might be, because neither the words nor the music provided are as good as they may be. Now here is an opportunity for Laemmle, which we understand he will embrace. We learn that he will not only market the songs, but also slides. For the latter there is an illimitable field. If they are up to the high standard of quality demanded by a critical public, they will be enormously popular. Laemmle can improve the quality, and if he does it it will be a good thing for the song slide, which has only to be properly handled to be more widely appreciated than it is at present.

TO OUR READERS.

We feel it to be our duty to warn our readers against the extremely lax business methods of the Marshaw Slide Company, of Kansas City, Mo. While this concern has not advertised in our pages we have received a very large number of complaints from people who have sent them money but have not been able to get the goods or even a reply to their letters. We wrote to the Marshaw Slide Company for an explanation and they replied that they were moving into new offices and expected to be able to catch up with their orders and correspondence in a short time. Meanwhile complaints still reach us and we advise the Marshaw Slide Company that it is better to carefully conduct a small business than to reach out beyond their capacity. Our pages are open to them for a satisfactory explanation.

The publishers of The Moving Picture World are very jealous of the character of the advertisements that appear in this paper and desire to hear from any reader who has received unfair treatment from any of its advertisers. We ask this because we have received a letter of complaint from a purchaser of a set of text books advertised in this paper by a Canadian concern. We did not see a set of these so-called text books until the advertisement had appeared, and while they contain some hints that are of value, yet they fall so far short of being the comprehensive text book that we feel disposed to offer to refund the price to any of our readers who have purchased a set of the books and have been disappointed with their bargain.

THE VALUE OF LANTERN SLIDES AS ADVERTISEMENTS FOR SHEET MUSIC.

By a Song Slide Maker.

I have lately been interested in Gotham gathering information concerning the value of song slides as an advertising medium for sheet music. From the standpoint of the publisher the slide is not a profit-creating adjunct. It is in fact an expense that many publishers have practically cut out altogether by turning over to the slide makers the privileges to make slides but refusing to handle any themselves. One publisher said:

"It is a foregone conclusion that the song slide does not increase the popularity of a song. In fact no illustrated song is left on long enough to-day, where illustrated songs are sung, to let the public get acquainted with it. Another reason is that the great majority of the illustrated song singers of to-day cannot sing. They only think they can. There isn't more than half a dozen singers of illustrated songs in New York to-day that are worth listening to and they are far below the standard of the ballad singers we listened to in the early days of illustrated songs. In those days Alonzo Hatch, the old tenor of the Boston Ideal Opera Company, James Aldrich Libbey, Charles Jacklin, Lote Silver, Harry Kessler, Lila Clarke, and many other ballad singers of fine voices and musical educations were the exponents of pictured melody. They have disappeared to give place to the would-be singers, with two notes in their voices, who sing illustrated songs for $12 per week, murdering songs so that their auditors don't listen to them but put in the time looking at the pictures and in most cases forget even the title of the song before the show is out. I have put out thousands of sets of song slides, but for the past four years it has been such an awful expense that I had to stop it. I cannot trace a single sale in months to the song being sung in these moving picture theaters, but I can believe readily that I can trace injuries to my business by the poor singers employed murdering my song.

"A song if it hits the public right will go without slides. I quote the song recently acquired by J. H. Remick Company, 'I Wish I Had a Girl.' Before Remick bought this song it was a hit. And the only slides which were used for it were the most frightful trash I ever saw. That they impeded the progress of the popularity of the song there is no doubt. After Remick got the song he got Wheeler to illustrate it and the slides made by the other maker were dumped into the ash can. I will never go back into the slide business again as long as the sun shines. You might just as well throw your money into the street."

Another publisher said: "Lantern slides? Nix for mine. I've spent ten thousand of dollars for song slides and I calculate that I am out just that much, if not more, by the injury slides have done my business. Slides will kill any song that has real merit, and if a song has real merit I would rather have it sung at one church concert than a dozen times in a theater. I don't cater to the trash who are singing ballads in the theaters these days. I'm looking for the church choir singers who take part in private concerts.

"Why a lady sang one of my publications at a private musicale in Jamaica, Long Island, some weeks ago, and I have been able to trace over a score of sales right to that concert."

And still another publisher gave his opinion thus: "Illustrated songs have developed into the worst curse the publishers of popular music ever contended with except the professional copy. Yes, I am still putting out song slides. I'm too much of a coward to discontinue the practice, but I know there are no good singers of ballads left on the stage to-day. Shades of Wambold and the old-time minstrels, they would turn over in their graves if they could hear the public singers to-day. The art of singing ballads in America has become a lost art. Thank the lantern slide and the stereopticon for it, too. The illustrated song was a great thing in its inception. Then it built up publishing houses. To-day it is destroying them. It is an unmitigated evil, yet it seems to increase in favor with the class of audiences that crowd into the dime theaters, but they don't listen to the song, they only look at the pictures. I wish I saw my way clear to discontinue the practice of giving out slides, but I cannot."

Another publisher who runs several moving picture shows and incidentally is a small publisher in music, said:

"I've got a new scheme. I only use a title page and chorus slide. I put the money I would spend for slides in the singer's salary. The moment I hear them sing I know whether they will do or not. If satisfactory, I give them to understand that they will sing in the full glare of the flood light and that they must memorize their songs. Therefore I want them well made up and attractively costumed. I do not employ any raucous saw-filling voiced low-brows or frosy heads. The girls who sing for me must have good pure voices and be dainty in appearance. If they show one tendency to be tough, out they go. I make my singers' appearance and quality of voice and correct behavior the attraction and cut out the poor slides. I throw as an announcement on the screen, a portrait of the singer with the information that Miss ——— will sing ———, the title of the song is here given. Then the flood light is turned on and the dainty miss steps out and sings the song. At the end of the second verse the chorus slide is thrown on and if the audience desires they can join in the second rendering of the chorus. Then the lights are turned up and the young lady takes her bow and retires. I have reduced my illustrated song presentation down to a purely advertising business, and I do not allow anything to distract the attention of my audience from the singer and the song. I keep my songs on one week and the people get acquainted with them. I sell them in the audience, and although I am not a big publisher I know that in the towns where I operate there are more of my publications sold than those of any other publisher, in fact all the other publishers.

"Not long ago I reprinted J. L. Malloy's 'Love's Old Sweet Song.' I had a very beautiful title page made for it with a copy of 'Love's Awakening' in colors on the title page. I put this on with only a title and chorus and the singer's portrait and she sang the song very prettily. There isn't a performance in my houses now where some of the audiences do not call for 'Love's Old Sweet Song,' and I have sold hundreds of copies."

When this publisher was asked if he did not allow other publishers' songs sung in his houses, he said: "Well, yes, sometimes when I run short of my own, but I've got quite a stock of my own and I don't see any of the big publishers putting themselves out of the way to benefit or favor me, so I'm looking out for number one. It was the urbane and suave reply that they did not give out slides without five dollars deposit being paid on them when I asked for the loan of their slides that caused me to reduce the art of illustrated songs to the actual question of an advertising medium.

Almost universally the music publishers were ready to admit that the illustrated song had driven the good singers from the stage and singing platform and that on the whole it was a detriment, but none of them could suggest a remedy except the one man who had thrown out the picture slides entirely.

USE GREAT NORTHERN QUALITY FILMS

Comments on Film Subjects.

Recent releases of the Great Northern Company include, "Winter Sports and Games at Stockholm, Sweden, 1909," and the "Danish Capital Under Snow," together with an Austrian Tyrol subject, which also deals with snow sports. There are three features about these films which should make them popular with moving picture audiences in America, particularly at this time of the year. First, the novelty of the subject, ice sports being mostly unknown here; secondly, the fact that they are snow scenes, and, thirdly, that they are suitably toned in two colors by a method that is attracting much attention in Europe. The photography of snow is one of the most difficult subjects to attack. An inexperienced photographer generally succeeds in rendering snow as an uninteresting patch of white, whereas, the experienced worker knows that snow is full of subtle tones and delicacies of color which require the greatest care in exposure and development. In these films, aside from the lively sporting interest attaching to them, the technical work is of a very high order of merit, which we are pleased to warmly commend. A prettily colored dream subject of "Neptune's Daughter" as the engaging heroine is also current and there are two other subjects on the familiar themes of love, true and false, which will no doubt please popular audiences.

The Great Northern Company are worthily keeping up the standard of moving picture films.

"A Baby's Shoe."—A Biograph picture full of dramatic situations and interest. In the hands of this capable company a simple story has been converted into a soul-stirring play. A mother is forced by her poverty to leave a baby girl on a wealthy family's doorstep. She returns to her home, where she has one little boy, is taken with a severe illness and dies almost instantly. The doctor summons a priest and he takes the little boy home. The mother retains one of the baby girl's little shoes and this the priest keeps when he takes the boy. Fifteen years pass. The boy has been brought up dedicated to the cause of the church. He is about to take holy orders when he stops a runaway and saves a girl from death. A mutual attachment springs up and they are about to be married. The family who have brought the girl up bring out all the things that they found with her, including the shoe. The priest starts in terror. He recognizes the shoe, and taking the mate from his own pocket declares that the marriage cannot proceed since this couple are brother and sister. The shock to the young people is fearful. Both nearly swoon. Then they are shown, the girl in a sister's garb and the boy with his vestments ready to assume his holy orders. The heart interest of the picture is unusually strong and the denouement is so real and the acting so good that it visibly affects the audience. It is a little different from the dramas usually presented by the Biograph Company, but it is none the less good. Details are carefully worked out and apart from a slight crowding in some of the staging there is nothing to criticise.

"The Bad Lands."—A Selig army post drama which has strong dramatic moments and is sufficiently alive to hold the almost breathless interest of the audience. Why the picture is named the "Bad Lands" does not appear. It might be named anything else, since the snow hides the landscape and the action is largely inside the post, excepting when the sallies are made for the purpose of subduing the Indians. The action is good and lively. There are some details of uniform which do not seem quite right, yet they scarcely affect the main proposition, the action of the story itself. In the main the photography is good, though some of the painted scenery shows too plainly its artificial character. The outdoor scenes with the ground covered with snow are natural and the quality is good.

"The Right to Labor."—A Lubin sermon on strikes which deserves the consideration of every thoughtful man who may some day be called upon to decide whether he shall go with a crowd of agitators or shall choose the conservative course and stand by his firm. There are some features of this film which are especially good. The scenes of the interior of a big iron manufacturing establishment in operation are well worth seeing. While the photography is not the best, it is still good enough to make the machinery and men easily discernible. The acting is good and the closing scene, where Capital and Labor clasp hands and the angel of prosperity waves the olive branch above them, is well worth preservation as an inspiration to conservative action when any dispute of this character arises.

"Bamboo Pole Equilibrists, India."—An Urban which gives a good illustration of the wonderful performances of street showmen in India. The film is a short record only, but breaks into a heavy program very acceptably. The photography is excellent, the tonal quality being far above the average, even for a foreign product.

"Wilbur Wright and H. M. King Edward VII."—An Eclipse record showing Wilbur Wright flying in his aeroplane in presence of King Edward VII. and his suite. The film is of exceptional quality, showing the operation of the flying machine in a wonderfully clear manner.

"The Timely Apparition."—An Eclipse film which illustrates some of the customs of the ancient Gallic world. Apart from its historic value, which may or may not be of consequence, the picture is well worth looking at. Seldom are rocks with the waves dashing over them reproduced with such fidelity to the original. The acting is not to be commended, but the photographic quality of the picture is beyond criticism. It is beyond question one of the best shown in a long time.

"A Striking Resemblance."—A Pathe comedy in which a gentleman receives word from another that he must marry his sister. He undertakes to escape from this mandate, but the brother is obdurate and refuses to allow any recession. The brother sends him out to buy the ring. While out the gentleman meets one who looks much like himself. He buys for him a suit of similar clothes and sends him to the house. Then the complications begin, but it is finally all straightened out, and the sister, who wants a man, succeeds in obtaining one. The situations are funny and many laughs resulted from the picture.

"A Golden Lie."—A Lubin which is interesting and, in places, thrilling, like many of the Lubin pictures. Rags is an orphan suffering abuse from the family with whom he lives, and this abuse is made very graphic by showing him eating without sitting at the table with the others and sleeping in a bed on the floor without covers. He saves the life of a wealthy man's daughter and is adopted by the gentleman and brought up as his son. He is shown later in life as his foster father's confidential clerk. The father has an own son who is a ne'er-do-well, gambling and otherwise wasting his life. He secures money from his father and gambles it away. He enters the office before his father comes in and, to save a disagreeable scene, the adopted son gives him money from his own pocket and hurries him out. While passing the office at night, Rags, the adopted son, sees a shadow on the curtain and enters to discover the son attempting to open the safe to rob his father. The robber is masked and Rags does not know who it is. Accordingly he telephones for the police and then proceeds to unmask the villain, discovering to his horror who it is. He has telephoned to the house and realizing the situation he forces the son to appear as though he had found Rags in the act of robbing the safe. The father enters and the situation is explained. He sends away the police and then drives Rags out of the office. He goes home heartbroken to tell his family the story. The daughter, who is in love with Rags, very forcibly declares that she doesn't believe it. She goes immediately to see Rags, but he confirms the statement and she, too, returns heartbroken. The real culprit can stand it no longer and confesses his fault. Then there is a conclusion that makes the blood tingle and the audience breaks into hearty applause. This is a simple story. Perhaps it may be said that it does not possess many dramatic elements, yet it is acted in such a convincing manner that the audience lives the story with the characters and cannot help but applaud when Rags is rewarded for his attempt to shield his benefactor from disgrace.

"Jones and the Lady Book Agent."—A Biograph comedy in which Jones, that man of many complications and tribulations, gets into a trap set by a lady book agent and almost falls a victim to her machinations. He refuses to buy her book, and afterward, when he is telling one of his friends about her, she returns for an umbrella she forgot and hears it. To get revenge she takes a box containing gloves which Jones had bought for his wife and placed in his overcoat pocket and substitutes her corsets for the gloves. Then she puts a letter in his pocket telling him that he forgot to return her corsets the last time he called and to please send them back. She sends a letter to his wife informing her that all is not right and to search his pockets. She finds the letter concerning the corsets and that leads to a storm. But Jones pacifies her and gives her the box. She opens it and finds a pair of corsets. Well, the fury of the tempest that breaks forth then can be imagined. It cannot be described. In the midst of it a note arrives from the book agent explaining that she played the trick for revenge and to please send back the corsets, because they are all she has. Unquestionably this film was considered funnier than anything that has been shown in a long time in two theaters where it was seen. But there is connected with it a certain broad suggestiveness that does not appeal to the person who cares for fun but does not want it coarse, and for that reason it cannot be commended. The Biograph people have developed far too many really funny pictures without a taint of suggestiveness to make it necessary for them to create false impressions by sending out a picture which has a taint.

"The Way to Happiness."—A Pathe picture which is beautiful to look at, being veritably a film d'art, but which tells one of those stories of infidelity and desertion which are depressing and in some degree untrue to average life, at least in this country. This is the story of an artist and his two loves, the first of which he deserts for the second, and the second deserts him. He undertakes to kill himself, and while recovering from the wound the first one goes to him and nurser him back to life. That way lies happiness. No good purpose seems to be served by these pictures. They are not amusing, only depressing and disagreeable, and there is not a particle of educative value in them.

"Eddie Is a Real Live One."—A Pathe comedy in which Eddie makes love to a woman who ignores him, and the difficulties he encounters and the ill-starred results of some of his attempts to win her form the basis of a number of amusing scenes. And he doesn't get her after all.

"A Four-Footed Hawkshaw."—A Gaumont in which a trained dog is introduced to trail a thief who has stolen a sum of money. The dog and his master, a so-called great detective, form an interesting combination, of which the dog is by far the better of the two. The whole picture is really a travesty upon so-called wonderful detective successes and deserves a long run for its educational value in refuting such fool statements as are frequently made.

"The New Pain Killer."—A Gaumont comedy in which a gentleman goes to have a tooth extracted, but is treated with a preparation which makes him immune from pain of any kind. He is subjected to numerous varieties of violent accidents and a rough house in many ways, but comes up smiling after each one. Suddenly the efficacy of the pain killer is exhausted and he suffers like the others. The next man who encounters him gets all that is coming to him. It is a funny film and is interesting because it is different from others of this type.

"Where There's a Will There's a Way."—A Vitagraph which deserves the highest praise because it is not only a good story, pleasant and entertaining, well told, but the technical quality deserves commendation as well. An English squire learns that his son in London is engaged to marry an actress. He writes the son forbidding the match and saying that he will be in London in a few days to see him. Meanwhile the actress concocts a scheme in which she secures a place as serving maid at the squire's lodging and cares for him so acceptably that he actually forces his son to marry her. The wedding is hastily solemnized to please the squire and he goes back home satisfied, only to discover that he has been outwitted by the young people. He swears all sorts of dire things upon them, but when the little woman appears it doesn't take her long to mollify him, and he accepts the inevitable and igves them his blessing. No description can tell the story of this picture. It is all so well staged, so well acted and so pleasing that one wants to see it many times instead of once. The technical quality is uniform, with a few exceptions, and the costuming is to be especially commended. Such films as this ought to run more than a day. They are too good to put in the background at the end of the first run.

"Mirielle's Sincere Love."—A Pathe which is full of pathos, so much so, indeed, as to be a bit gloomy. Mirielle and Vincent love each other, but when her stern old father is asked for his consent to their marriage he refuses. Brokenhearted, Mirielle wanders away. She comes to a wayside shrine where she prays fervently. She then staggers back to the old meeting place, a church, where Vincent finds her. But it is too late. Her heart has been broken by the anguish she has undergone and she dies in his arms. This film would be worth seeing without the story. That is too gloomy and depressing to be entertaining. But the scenery is beautiful, and it is shown with all the attention to tonal quality for which the Pathes are famous. One cannot commend the story as an amusing or even instructive feature, but the staging is beyond criticism.

"The Pretty Flower Girl."—A Pathe film d'art which tells the usual French story of infidelity and intrigue between a married gentleman and a flower girl. The gentleman's wife discovers this intrigue, dresses as a man and actually wins the flower girl away from her husband. They begin a duel over the girl, but her wig falls off and he discovers who he is fighting and they make up, and, as the old stories run, live happily ever after. The staging, the costuming and the action of this film are all exceptionally good, but it is the same old story of infidelity, which does not apply in America as it may in France, though one has doubts that it is a common thing even there. The film is so good technically that one almost wishes the characters might have worked out some other story.

"An Uneven Keel."—A Gaumont which tells a story of French sea life that is both depressing and quite the opposite. A husband and father is lost at sea. To keep her mother from suffering the daughter dons men's clothes and ships on board a boat. Before sailing the new sailor takes the others out for a drink. They get into a quarrel and the newcomer is wounded, which leads to the discovery that the supposed sailor is a girl. She is taken home, and the next day one of the sailors who was with her when she was wounded calls to woo and the betrothal occurs immediately. One scarcely knows whether to commend this film or not. The technical quality is good, but the subject, looked at in one way is depressing and in another seems quite impossible. Perhaps most people in the audience were interested in it as it run, but will not remember it long enough to have it do either harm or good.

"For Her Country's Sake."—A Vitagraph war story which introduces some well-known characters. It opens at Gen. Logan's headquarters, where a woman secret service agent volunteers to carry a duplicate message of great importance through a country infested with the enemy. He sends another dispatch by another rider. The man falls into the hands of the enemy, but the girl escapes, though shortly afterward her horse gives out and she takes refuge in a deserted house. She finds a dress in a closet, which she dons, and this enables her more the readily to assume the role of mistress. The soldiers bring their prisoner there. He has been wounded and the woman offers to dress his wound. In doing this she is able to prevent the dispatch, which is concealed in the bandage around his head, falling into the hands of the enemy. The squad rides away, all but one, taking their prisoner with them. This one is suspicious, and watching the woman through the window he sees her pick the dispatch out of the discarded bandage. He enters the house, only to be forced into a closet at the muzzle of a revolver. She hastily mounts his horse and rides away toward the Union lines, reaching Gen. Grant's headquarters with the dispatches all in good time. One feature of this film is attractive. The ground is covered with snow, and the manufacturers have not forgotten to work out details. Every actor is prepared for Winter. The rides are not so long as to become tiresome and the technical quality of the picture is excellent. It is stirring and interesting, without bloodshed. Withal it is well worth adding to any programme.

"Lunatics in Power."—An Edison picture illustrating what might happen if lunatics in an asylum were accorded the power of running the place themselves. They are about serving up a visitor as a chicken when the keepers, who have been locked up by the lunatics, are released and the crazy persons are hurried back to their cells. The advisability of using any affliction as serious as lunacy as a basis for sport is questionable, though aside from that the film is lively and not unattractive. To make irresponsible persons the target for fun will not appeal to a majority of a manager's audience, unless he is located in a peculiar portion of the country. Certainly the theme is novel, but is not handled to the best advantage.

"A Mexican's Gratitude."—An Essanay film which has some thrilling scenes and is certain to please the average audience wherever it is shown. There is life and action without bloodshed and the melodramatic features are made attractive rather than repulsive. The story is that a Mexican is saved from being hanged as a horsethief by the sheriff. He writes the word "Gratitude" on a card, tears it in two and give one half to the sheriff and keeps the other half himself. Years afterward this same sheriff falls in love with a girl of the West. She is wanted by a cowboy and he contrives to bring the sheriff and another girl together, and gets the girl the sheriff loves there just in time to see him in the scheming girl's embrace. Explanations are impossible and he sees the girl he wants walk away with the false cowboy. The sheriff has a fight with him and forces him to confess his treachery. The cowboy goes to a Mexican's hut and secures the services of two greasers to do his bidding. The three lie in wait for the sheriff and his sweetheart, overpower them and drag them away to the Mexican's hut where the cowboy tantalizes the sheriff for a time and then forces the girl into another room. The Mexican wants some tobacco and sees a sack projecting from the sheriff's pocket. In pulling it out he pulls out also the half of the card with the word "Gratitude" upon it. When the cowboy returns to the room he is comparing the card. He then asks the sheriff if that was given him by a man whom he saved from lynching a few years before. The sheriff replies that it was. Whereupon the Mexican immediately loosens the sheriff's bonds and a fight between the sheriff and the cowboy ensues. The sheriff has him across a table choking him into insensibility when the girl appears and begs him to stop and they go away together. It is impossible to invest this story in telling with the life that is in the picture. It seems almost as though the characters were going to speak, they do their parts so naturally, while the staging is remarkably good. The film was heartily applauded in two theaters where it was seen the past week, and everyone who attends motion picture shows knows that applause is somewhat rare.

"The Peddler's Reward."—An Eclipse film which tells a tender little story in a series of attractive pictures. A peddler in passing along a highway with his donkey is besought by a little girl to help her father who has been hurt by a tree falling upon him. The peddler assists him to the road and places him on his donkey and takes him home. Later the peddler's donkey is stolen. The little girl sees it and recognizes it and through her running to tell him the donkey and the goods are secured and the thieves are arrested. The pictorial quality of this film is good, and the pleasant little story adds to its attractiveness.

"Forgotten."—An Eclipse picture which shows a young couple betrothed. The young man goes away to sea. Shortly afterward word comes that he has been lost. Time goes on and another betrothal occurs. The contrast between the outside and inside of the home is what makes this picture striking. Inside the audience is shown the young woman changing her mourning cap for one of white and sees the betrothal ceremonies going on. Then it changes. Outside the seafarer, whom they all supposed lost, is seen looking in at the window. He sees the ceremonies and turns and walks away, forgotten. The picture is more interesting for what it suggests than for what it shows. In itself it doesn't show very much, but it starts a train of thought in the mind of everyone who sees it that will make it seem unusually interesting. The photographic quality is up to the Eclipse standard.

"The Defaulting Solicitor."—A film without a manufacturer's mark which shows the defaulting of a solicitor, as they are termed in Europe, several fights and a couple of murders, or what look like murders. One cannot say much for it, except that it would seem like a good film to keep off one's programme. The lighting is very poor, in some places so dim that it is almost impossible to distinguish the figures. Some of this may be due to poor operation of the machine, but where it was seen it was certainly anything but good, or even reasonably attractive.

"Damnation of Faust." A film from the Melee Society which purports to show the underground world where Faust eventually has damnation. In some respects the scenic efforts are good, but as a whole there is a lack of naturalness which reduces the attractiveness of the conception. If some means could be devised to make the scenery look less painted this would be a good picture.

"I Will Have a Husband."—A Warwick comedy which shows a woman of uncertain age determined upon securing a husband. She tries a number, but they escape her. She goes into her room and seeing a man's feet under her bed she holds the burglar at bay while a clergyman and a policeman are sent for. She forces him at the muzzle of the pistol to marry her and when the picture ends she is applying the squeeze in a way that must have made him wish he had undertaken to burglarize any other house that night.

"The Gambler's Vow."—A Raleigh & Roberts which shows a gambler who has lost every dollar. He goes home and in rushing about the room breaks a number of statues. As he sits mourning over his fate a fairy appears and eacts from him a promise of reform. She then causes the statues to go back in place, and draws from its hiding place a large sum of money. Forgetting his vow not to gamble any more the man hurries away and loses all again. He returns to his home and shortly afterward the statues fall again to the floor and all the benefits which the fairy bestowed disappear. The picture gives opportunity for some very clever magic and where the statue of the baby is formed before the audience is one of the prettiest pieces of work seen in a long time. The photographic quality is generally good, though there are weak places here and there. It is a film with plenty of action and the unusual development of the story adds to its attractiveness.

"The Note in the Shoe."—A Biograph film which has the originality and life of all the Biograph productions. A girl packer in a shoe factory places a note in a shoe in which she says she is good looking and a good housekeeper and would be pleased to hear from any well intentioned gentleman who might find it. The shoes fall into the hands of a grouchy customer who returns them and refuses to trade longer with the store. The note is returned to the factory with the statement of its effect. The girl is called before the manager and discharged, but the manager is so struck with her appearance that he reinstates her. As he sees more of her he is more and more attracted by her and finally deciding that she is out of place he has her discharged on some trumped-up offense. She goes sorrowfully to her mother and says that she doesn't know why she was discharged. While they are talking the door opens and the manager enters. He starts in to scold her savagely, telling her that as a shoepacker she is a failure, but as his wife she would be a great success. The acting in this picture is good, like all the Biograph acting, and the whole is carried out with a uniformity which leaves nothing to be desired. It is an exceptionally good picture and brought hearty applause in one theater.

"One Busy Hour."—Jim Smith owns a grocery, in this Biograph film, which does no business. Accordingly he determines to sell. He attracts a possible customer and to make the sale doubly sure he furnishes all his friends with money to rush in and purchase while the possible customer is there. The proposed buyer watches the rush for an hour, then goes out and writes a note saying that the business is too strenuous for him and declines to purchase. Smith has his grocery, while his friends have profited by the scheme to dispose of it. When the picture ends he has fallen fainting into his friends' arms.

"Fatherhood and Dunkenness."—A Pathe film which teaches a moral lesson. It is the reform of a drunken father by seeing his boy drowning in a canal lock. There isn't much point to it, though it cannot be said that the picture might not be useful. However, the average audience doesn't care particularly for sermons of this character. They prefer something lively or amusing.

"The Old Hall Clock."—A Lubin story which pleases every audience which sees it. A part of it is of Revolutionary times and a part of modern times. The Revolutionary story shows a spy pursued by British soldiers fleeing to the home of his sweetheart. She hides him in the old hall clock, but as he steps into it he discovers that it is the entrance to a secret passage which leads to a cave beneath the house. There he is secure until the search ceases, then he comes back to the clock and escapes. The modern story is that a wedding is about to be celebrated in the same house. The bridegroom is waylaid by brigands and taken to a cave. A note is sent to the house that if $10,000 is not left at a certain tree by the stroke of midnight the groom will be killed. The company gathers its wealth, but it falls short of the required sum, and midnight is approaching. In the cave the watch set over the young man leaves him for a time. He frees himself from his bonds and while looking for some means of escape sees the specters of the former lover and sweetheart appear from behind a rock and disappear again. He follows and just as the old clock strikes twelve walks into the room through the clock into the arms of the waiting bride. The wedding is solemnized then and there. No mere description can convey any adequate conception of the interest which this story excites. Perhaps there are some details missing, but the plot is so good and it is worked out so graphically that everyone in the audience holds his breath almost and then breaks into vigorous applause as the groom enters the room to claim his bride. This film is recommended to any manager who wants a good story for his programme.

"Fuss and Feathers."—An Edison comedy in which the fuss is supplied by an old fellow who is not satisfied with anything and the feathers come in various forms, like a feather duster applied to his face when he is trying to sleep, an impossible creation in the form of a hat, with huge feathers upon it, a feather bed on fire in which the impossible hat is consumed and half a dozen other feather features which serve to create more and more fussiness on the part of the old fellow. Finally he ends up with a thorough thumping administered by his wife because he burned her hat. As an addition to the variety in the programme this film is good enough, but it really hasn't much point to it.

"The Doctored Dinner Pail."—An Edison comedy which shows a workman eating his noon-day luncheon and taking copious draughts from a pail by his side. Another workman engaged in oiling a steam roller near pours a quantity of oil from his oiler into the pail. The next drink is enough. When the engineer's back is turned the workman pours the contents of the pail into the water tank of the engine. Then when the roller starts it becomes intoxicated and does a number of curious stunts for a huge steam roller. It finally runs over the workman who doctored the tank and flattens him out completely. A doctor is summoned and securing a bicycle pump he pumps the crushed clothing full of air and the workman walks away. It is a fun producer and in making sport of a steam roller is original.

"Instantaneous Nerve Powder."—A Pathe comedy in which the vivifying influence is a powder projected from a bellows. It has the same effect as liquid electricity and other forms of this sort of by-play. It is not original and, indeed, ranks far below some which have gone before in fun and interest.

"Chinese Wedding."—A Pathe record showing the manners and customs at a wedding in China. The photography is good for a scene of this sort and it gives a fair idea of some of the ceremonies when a Chinese marries.

"Haunted by the Cops."—A Pathe showing the troubles of a man who is haunted by policemen no matter where he goes. Even when he goes to buy a coat it changes to a policeman's uniform as soon as he puts it on and he finds policemen all over. It has some humorous situations, but has little interest beyond the mere fact that this fellow is a good actor and actually appears frightened.

"Love's Triumphs."—A Kalem which is certain to attract a good deal of attention because of the heart stories it tells. A man is divorced from his wife because of his dissipation. The woman goes to live with the rector of the parish. Five years after the man becomes engaged to a teacher and the wedding is about to be celebrated when the divorced wife comes on the scene and stops it. The teacher says she will marry him if he will reform. But she falls in love with the rector and the rector does with her, but supposes that she still loves the divorced man. She tries in every possible way to induce him to say that he loves her, but he fails to see the point. The divorced man finally decides that he will go back to his wife and writes a letter to the teacher informing her of the fact. She runs with it to the rector and everything is made straight. The divorced couple come together and there is rejoicing all around. It is one of those heart stories which appeal by their simplicity and truth to everyday life. The acting is good and the technical quality excellent.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CLAMOR FOR CHANGE A MENACE TO THE BUSINESS.

Baltimore, Md., May 6, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Your editorial, "Changing Films," should be intelligently read and understood wherever moving pictures are shown, especially by the fellow who converts his laundry or livery stable into a moving picture theater and who rents his films only to secure the greatest number of feet, regardless of their quality.

Moving pictures will remain a permanent amusement fixture so long as the public are convinced they are expensive and do not grow on trees. Show on a screen twenty-one reels of film in a week, at an admission of five cents and they cannot but prove, eventually, as common as a cheap collar button on a Bowery pushcart.

Twenty-one reels of first class film cannot be bought, every week, from either licensed or independent makers, nor a continuous output of even twelve or fourteen be depended upon for even quality; therefore, it is vital that exhibitors encourage manufacturers to create features and not farces; cut their film supply in half without decreasing the weekly rental expense, and profit by the added patronage extended by those who appreciate better productions, properly produced.

I have in mind houses using six reels per week, in three changes, who are adding to their bank accounts without a question, simply because they insist on selecting their programmes and use nothing but new and perfect films. In the same block may be found other houses, fitted up at a heavy expense, these using twelve reels per week, each, and doing 50 per cent. less business.

One house pays $100 a week for service whole the other pays but $45. The latter fellow gets twelve reels.

A good film should run at least two days, as "come-backs" to a picture show should be made the life of the business—they all have friends and neighbors.

The man who uses these six reels can get the best without any trouble from either manufacturing faction, be it independent or licensed, but when double the amount are shown, one-half of these must necessarily prove mediocre and worthless.

Were you to advocate less films and better ones, further warning to the thoughtless and inexperienced exhibitor against demoralizing and destroying the dignity and value of high class motion picture productions, there would soon be a hurry and scurry of incompetent and unscrupulous manufacturers to other fields of human endeavor and the business would be assured permanency.

Your valuable medium should be read by every exhibitor in America, no matter what his policy may be. You are pursuing the course of the high class manufacturer; putting the stuff in the product you market. You are paying for worthy manuscript, weekly, which every man who cares about his business should be eager to read and be thankful for. Any business must be properly manned by experienced individual heads of departments to prove successful. No one man can do everything about his shop and do it well.

You come out in the open and give the Independents a share of the applause, regardless of any "commercial" notions you might entertain, whereas a contemporary refuses to allow anyone to even show him where he might be slightly twisted in his knowledge of film conditions and facts.

THE REFORM OF THE SONG SLIDE.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—I see in your issue of May 8 that your song slide critic is going through another spasmodic evolution and while his remarks might be read with some degree of discernment by the uninitiated, to anyone having the slightest knowledge of the production of song slides his article is ludicrous. He is again out with his knocks against song slides in general, as he says that "they are no particular friends of his," and then he goes on to say, BUT I'M NOT EVERYBODY. This is about the only truthful thing that seems to emanate from his song-slide-diseased-brain. He knows about as much about the song slide business as a parrot which I buried seven years ago because he talked himself to death. In the first place, the song illustrator is absolutely dependent upon the publisher for his material. He spouts "for more humor, Mr. Song Slide Maker. You live in a land of humor. It surrounds you."

The song slide maker is surrounded by humor when he has a humorous song to illustrate and only then. We have illustrated songs of men dying on the battlefield, of mothers dying awaiting the return of their sons, and sweethearts dying awaiting the return of their lovers, all posed to graphically portray the nature of the song. I suppose Lux Graphicus would like us to put instead of a dying mother a circus clown or a dressed up monkey, in order to introduce "humor," but if we adhered to his general idea of humor we would soon be out of business.

The moving picture people create their own synopses and can introduce any action, either ludicrous or pathetic, as they please. The song slide maker cannot do this any more than a stage manager could introduce a boxing match in the grave scene of Hamlet. He says that the secret of success in the song slide business is general interest, love isn't. His brain must be addled or probably made of wood, as the ruling passion throughout the world from the time of Adam and Eve is love, without which the world would be a chaotic mess, the same as he seems to be in at the present time, and his income from such spasms as we have had the extreme pleasure of reading in your columns in the past few months is probably proportionate to his capabilities. "He larfs," but we don't.

Your writer says he first saw song slides in "London, a city of some magnitude in England." I suppose he imagines this is humor, as it is a geographical fact that London is the largest city in the world, but the fact of the matter is that stereopticon slides were first used in conjunction with illustrating a song by Mr. Meyer Cohen, in San Francisco, about 20 years ago. A BAD BARGAIN.

St. Louis, Mo., May 11, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—In the issue of The Moving Picture World of May 1, I saw an ad. of the Driben Publishing Company, London, Ontario, Canada, for five reference books at $2. I am enclosing you booklets and consider it one of the biggest frauds that was ever pulled off. Enclosed you will also find stamped envelope for the return of booklets.

Yours very truly,

THE SONGS.

In most of the leading theaters new songs have been presented this week, with the result that the audiences have been more than pleased. Some of these songs were very good, allowing opportunity for excellent illustrations, and these have been supplied by the large slide makers. In two instances slides by Scott & Van Altena and two other songs with slides by De Witt C. Wheeler have been unusually good. The pictures have been artistic and the coloring is the best these popular makers have yet shown.

One song illustrated by Scott & Van Altena was quite up to the standard so far as pictures were concerned, but the song itself was weak. This was not the fault of the slide makers, however, and they made the most of their material. Such songs as have been offered during the week have added greatly to the programmes, and the audiences have applauded them vigorously.

Some old songs have been used, with slides from the best makers, and these have taken well, too. But in the main the songs have been new and in all instances have formed a strong feature of the programmes.

Morris Levy, manager of the Italo-American Film Exchange, with offices at 138 Third avenue, New York City, desires to announce that he is positively no longer connected with the firm of Harstn & Co., nor with the Knickerbocker Film Exchange. He also reports that business is rushing with him. Theater managers should write to this concern for their prospectus.

The Levi Company, song slide makers, have moved to 24 Union quare, where they have taken a whole floor in a large building and divided it up into business offices, coloring department and dark rooms, each with about four times the space they had in their former quarters. No business in this line has made more remarkable progress than this company in the two years of their existence. This progress is due to the fact that the Levi Company delivers the goods, at the right price and of the right quality. Standing orders have resulted wherever their slides have been sent, and they have secured commissions from some of the leading song publishers for the sole right of illustration of their songs. There is a smack of originality in the work of the Levi Company that has won favor with the trade, as well as the constant aim for better quality. We have been shown some of the work that has been done in the new quarters and certainly no one could wish to see more tasteful coloring or better illustrations. If their work continues to improve and meets with the appreciation of the trade it will not be long before even their present quarters will be too small for the business which will come their way.

THE LECTURES.

It is the custom now to divide the lectures into six parts in some houses, thus extending them through the week. This has the merit of superior atractiveness. It is quite likely to interest an audience, and in numerous instances they will come back to hear the continuation. For example, a lecture on the North American Indian was especially good and the illustrations were quite in line with the text. While this lecture was popular in the sense that an attempt was made to escape from the dry-as-dust methods of the average scientist, enough of the scientific accuracy of the subject was woven into the lecture to make it authoritative. Another lecture on Japan has attracted much favorable attention. Some of the illustrations which accompany this lecture are marvels of artistic photography and coloring.

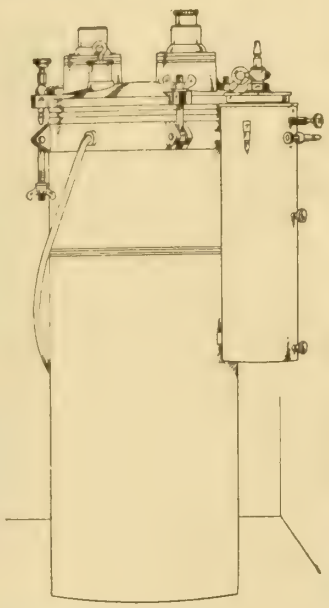
PORTABLE GAS-MAKING OUTFIT
EDISON OXYGEN GENERATOR



What Motion Picture Exhibitor has not at times wished that he had a reliable and inexpensive means for producing gas that would render him independent of the electric light companies? Traveling Exhibitors, especially, have often felt the need of a good outfit that would take the place of calcium outfits, which are frequently difficult to get or are held up in transit when wanted the most.

The Edison Oxygen Generator and Saturator fill this need. They have been designed to produce a complete generating outfit to take the place of Oxygen and Hydrogen gas sold in cylinders. This apparatus produces the gases automatically, in a safe, simple and direct manner, without the necessity of any knowledge of chemistry on the part of the operator.

The Oxygen is produced by the reaction between water and a compound of which Sodium Peroxide is the principal ingredient. This compound in its most compact and convenient form is known as Oxone, though the Generator will work equally well with another form of the compound known as Oxylithe.

Retorts, rubber bags, wash bottles, pumps and cylinders are entirely done away with. There is nothing to do but to put in the Compound and water, attach the gas outlet to the Ether Saturator and adjust the flame by the needle valves on the Saturator. The apparatus does the rest.

We want every present or prospective Motion Picture Exhibitor to write us for detailed information about this outfit.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

THE JILT.—Awful results of a capricious woman's whims. John Hale and Frank Allison have become staunch friends at college, and the day of separation, at the end of the course, was a sad one indeed, particularly for Frank when he discovered that his little crippled sister, Mary, had fallen deeply in love with Jack. Jack goes out into the world, meets and becomes smitten with Miss Dorothy Kirk, a cold, heartless beauty. Dorothy had engaged herself to several worthy young men, but her capriciousness had caused her to throw them aside, so when she is sought by John Hale we feel that she has at last found her affinity. They are engaged and the affinition sealed with a ring, but the usual change of heart comes, and this time on the day of their to-be nuptials, when Jack receives the following note: "Mr. John Hale, Dear Sir—Am sorry to write I cannot marry you to-day or ever. Pardon delaying my decision until the last moment, but better late than never. Dorothy Kirk." At the same time returning his ring. Humiliated and crushed, Jack stood in his wedding clothes, hardly realizing the cruel truth. From that moment a change comes over him—the noble, manly, courageous fellow becomes in spirit a weakling. Down, down he goes, disappointed, discouraged and distressed, until we find him simply a drink-devastated, emaciated human frame as he enters a saloon to buy a drink. While seated at one of the tables he glances over a newspaper and an article strikes his eye announcing the marriage of his college chum, Frank Allison, to Miss Dorothy Kirk on that afternoon. Rushing from the place on vengeance bent he makes his way to Frank's home to give him that awful note she had sent him some time before, but when he sees Frank so radiantly happy he decides to hold his peace and crushes the note in his hand out of sight. Frank, upon seeing his awful plight, prevails upon him to stay. As he leaves for the adjoining room he drops the note, which Frank picks up and reads. He now realizes the cause of his chum's condition, and in an instant his love turns to hate, so he resolves to pay her back in her own coin. He writes a note identical in wording with hers, addressing it "Miss Dorothy Kirk"; signing it "Frank Allison." Feigning illness he dispatches it by Jack, who assumes it an excuse for illness. In he rushes in the midst of the wedding throng. You may imagine the scene. Here Jack unwittingly wreaks vengeance. On Jack's return to Frank he finds little sister Mary's hand held out helpingly to him.

RESURRECTION.—Free adaptation of Leo Tolstoy's powerful novel. The subject opens with the return home of Prince Dimitri, who meets the maid Katusha, a little peasant girl, and is instantly charmed with her beauty. Young, artless and innocent, as pretty as a rose, she unwittingly fascinates the prince. His noble bearing likewise impresses her, and his little attentions flatter her, until at length she is unable to resist his advances. The poor girl is meted the usual fate. An alliance is out of the question. The disparity of their ranks even forbids it, and soon the prince must cast her aside. Five years later we find that the girl, who is now a loathsome sight, has learned the bitter lesson of the eternal truth, "The wages of sin is death." It is death to the soul at all events. She has gone down to the lowest depths and is arrested in a low Russian tavern. As she is carried to the tribunal she passes Prince Dimitri, who now sees the terrible result of his sins. He grows repentant and attempts to plead her cause before the jury, but they are a callous lot and pay no attention to the arguments for nor against, and by force of habit vote to send her to Siberia. She is dragged out to the pen of detention and herded with a lot of poor unfortunates, who scarcely bear any resemblance to human beings. The repentant prince determines to give up his life to right the wrong he has done, and visits her here with a view of turning her now vicious nature, handing her a copy of the Bible. She does not recognize him at first, but when she does she flies into fury, beating his body and face with her fists and the book. He leaves her and she sits moodily on the bench with the book on her lap. Shortly she turns its pages and lo, the Resurrection! Her eyes fall on the passage (John xi, 25), "And Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead yet shall he live." In an instant her whole being changes. There is hope for her salvation, and she reads on. The guards arrive and we next see her with the poor unfortunates trudging over the snow-clad steppes toward the goal from whence few return. She becomes the ministering angel, sharing her comforts with them. The prince, meanwhile, has secured her pardon and hastens after her. Giving her the welcome notice, he begs her to return with him as his wife; but no, she prefers to work out her salvation helping those poor souls to whom a kindness is an indescribable blessing, and bidding him farewell, she renounces the world for the path of duty, so we leave her kneeling on the snow at the foot of the Holy Cross.

A SOMNAMBULISTIC HERO.—Willie is a sleep-walker. In his somnambulistic periods he does some wonderful feats. In our picture we show one where he unconsciously becomes a hero. His condition has become so acute that his parents send him to a friend's house in the country, hoping that a change of scene will cure him. In the country Willie falls in love with Mary, the beautiful daughter of the hostess. Mary discards Jack, her country lover. She takes a fancy to Willie, who, in return, is also smitten with Mary. Jack, the discarded lover, returning from hunting, stops at the house. The sight of his gun scares Willie. Mary's younger sister, Nellie, wanders away. Tramps, who have been seen in the neighborhood, are suspected of having taken the child. They again appear, insult Mary, Willie again showing the "white feather." Jack arriving on the scene, knocks the tramps down, saves Mary, who now turns from Willie to Jack. Willie retires crestfallen. Neighbors search for Nellie. Willie takes a gun and accompanies them in fear and trembling, and finally returns to the house and goes to sleep. While asleep he suddenly starts forth with gun in hand in search for Nellie. He finds his way to the tramps' camp, rounds the tramps up, thrashes the trio, rescues Nellie and wakes up to find himself an unconscious hero. Length, 900 feet.

THE SANDMAN.—Far up in the moon on a silver couch the Sandman rests. When the shadows of night steal over the earth he slips safely through space with his bag of fine wrought sand on his side and wherever he finds wakeful eyes closes them with sand.

A dainty thing, this idea, to weave into a picture story and it has been spun on the film with all the charm of a gentler imagery and poetic touch, coupled here and there with the raciest satirical humor. Of this latter sort is the scene in the detectives' bureau, where the stalwart investigators are put to slumber under the defiant sign "We Never Sleep," to be awakened only by an anarchist's bomb, and the incident of the officer and his sweetheart who are literally "sanded" to sleep on a park bench, the policeman to be awakened and confronted by his sergeant.

Filled with daintiness are the scenes where the Sandman puts the children to sleep while at the table, and later completes his work in the case of a defiant little one in the nursery before returning to his home in the moon. Length, 685 feet.

LITTLE MISS MOFFIT AND SIMIAN STONE: A Farcial Pantomime.—Some years ago a well-known quartette made a big laughing hit wherever they appeared with a song which read:

"I went to the animal fair, the birds and beasts were there,
A big baboon by light of the moon was combing his auburn hair,
The monkey, he got drunk, climbed up the elephant's trunk,
The elephant sneezed, fell on his knees,
And that was the end of the monk, the monk, the monk."

There isn't a hint of a laugh in those words as they are written, but everyone is familiar with monkeys and their antics and it was the suggestion of what laughable things that particular monkey must have been doing prior to the trunk climbing stunt which brought the gales of laughter from audiences at the verse.

Simian Stone, the monkey comedian, in this picture doesn't get intoxicated. He doesn't have to. He is funny enough as it is. The point is, however, that one can't describe his antics. The laugh provoking qualities of his comedy work in this film must be understood by suggestion, and anyone who has laughed at the antics of even ordinary monkeys can grasp that. Laugh, there is a laugh in every move of the Simian actor. Even the hardened director and other onlookers at the time the film was in making were convulsed with laughter as the simple story was developed with its "monkey-shines."

As a contrast to the hairy ugliness of the comedian Little Miss Moffit, who so cleverly assists him, is as dainty a maiden as any that were ever used as models for those on the swelling curves of Royal Dresden ware.

To laugh, to have the merriest of minutes, is to see this comedy and its actor, to laugh not only from its start to its finish, but for many minutes after the last flicker has departed from the screen.

The New York Zoological Society was the means through which this genuine monkey and remarkable actor was secured for this film. Length, 315 feet.

THE GIRL SPY.—During the latter part of our great Civil War, when the Union Army had pushed their operations into the South Atlantic States, the general in command of the campaign was very much harrassed by the miraculous way in which his plans became known to the enemy. Numerous attempts were made to discover the source of the enemy's information, but they proved futile. It was not until several years after the close of the war that he learned it was due to the daring work of a young girl spy. The daughter of a Southern family, left motherless in early childhood, her life had become embittered by the death of her father and only brother during one of the early struggles of the great conflict. She had consecrated her entire life to the cause of their beloved Southland.

THE WORLD UPSET.—The world completely upset. Rolling irregularly through the sky, disregarding all natural laws, the earth presents a peculiar aspect, everything reversed. Length, 297 feet.

HE COULDN'T LOSE HER.—An automobile enthusiast is about to go on a little spin when his wife expresses a desire to accompany him. Reluctantly he complies, resolving to give her such an experience that she will have no desire for further indulgences. At full speed they are seen coming down the street, meeting with numerous mishaps by way of collisions with every conceivable object, but each time both are unharmed. All efforts to discourage his wife proving futile they are about to return home when the motor explodes and the husband is battered up considerably. His wife thereupon loads him in the car and acting as chauffeur brings the machine and her husband safely home. Length, 282 feet.

THE POLICEMAN SLEEPS.—Two gendarmes are seen going on duty, one of short and the other of taller stature. Being rather tired the tall fellow concludes to rest on a bench and the other remains on guard to prevent any interference.

In his efforts to maintain peace and quiet the guard stops an organ grinder from playing; a florist's cart is not allowed to pass; the regimental band is silenced and the tramp of soldiers is hushed.

Finally the shades of evening gather and he tries to awaken his slumbering companion, but in vain. All possible means are resorted to, but without success.

In the distance two highwaymen are perceived approaching and with quaking voice the guard announces this fact, whereupon the sleeper, as if by magic, arouses and both go in pursuit of the now fleeing highwaymen. Length, 344 feet.

JUSTICE OF MERCY.—Driven to desperation by a series of misfortunes a poor man adds further to his troubles by attempting to appropriate another's property.

The act is discovered but the only witness is a Sister of Charity acting in the capacity of a nurse.

After an exciting chase the guilty man is caught but not until he has had an opportunity to discard the article stolen and thus divert suspicion. But the article is found and the man with his child, a picture of abject misery, are brought before the victim. The nurse, moved to compassion, stifles her conscience and declares that he is not the guilty person, thus securing the man's pardon. Length, 400 feet.

A GUEST'S PREDICAMENT.—A count about to enter the home of a baroness where a dance is to be given, is approached by a drunkard and asked for a light. The service being refused he receives a kick, leaving the impression of the man's foot on his coat tail.

The count upon entering the brilliantly illuminated hall room at once becomes the object of much attention, and much laughter is caused by his odd appearance. Greatly disconcerted, he leaves the room and seeks the aid of a servant who directs him to a room on an upper floor of the house.

This room, however, is occupied by an uninvited guest, who at the point of a revolver, causes the count to exchange garments with him. Seeing the man lay the weapon aside the count promptly seizes it and endeavors to retaliate by turning the tables on his antagonist, but the latter reaches forward and pulls a string on the weapon converting it into a fan, whereupon he beats a hasty retreat. The servant rushes back and reports "a man in the house," whereupon the police are called and reinforced by the men of the party armed with all manner of weapons they start for the upper floor and there mistake the unfortunate count for the marauder. After their mistake is discovered the officers go in quest of the guilty party and succeed in locating him and recovering the count's clothes. Length, 471 feet.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

(George Kleine)

CAUGHT ON THE CLIFFS.—During an excursion through the mountains a nurse accidentally drops the infant in her charge over the cliffs. The parents, almost frantic, run to seek guides to look for the child, which in the meantime is rescued by an aged shepherd, who keeps and provides for him during the years that follow. Many years after the accident, a friend of the parents of the lost child, traveling through the same mountains meets the shepherd, and upon remarking about the boy in the latter's company, is told the history of the little fellow. He at once relates the story of the accident and the old shepherd sorrowfully takes the OBJECTIONS OVERCOME.—A troubadour is seen strolling along the road in company with his little brother. At an inn he meets a young lady with whom he immediately falls in love, a case of love at first sight. The young lady's father, however, will not consent to her marriage to a penniless songster. As the rejected suitor leaves the inn he meets a squire and party who engage him to play for them. When next he appears at the inn with his new company he wears a suit that distinguishes him as a man of prominence. He finds the innkeeper's daughter is now being courted by the squire and angrily interferes, thereby precipitating a quarrel. A duel is about to be fought when his little brother seizes a big sword and threatens the squire, who laughs merrily at the bravado of the little fellow, and obliges the innkeeper to consent to his daughter's marriage to the man of her choice. Length, 430 feet.

LUBIN MFG. CO.

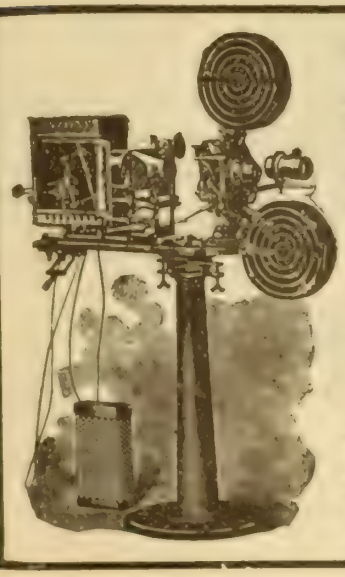
A GOLDEN LIE.—"Rags" the Little Orphan. Rags scarcely clad sells papers at the street corner. Business was very poor to-day and so he returns hesitatingly to the house where shelter is given him for the money which he earns through selling papers. More than once he had been maltreated for not selling all the papers and he does not fare any better this day. A few morsels of food are thrown at him after which he seeks his resting place for the night, a sack of straw.

Rags Is Taken Care Of. Rags is at his street corner selling papers. Suddenly he sees a finely dressed girl crossing the street just as a bicycle rider approaches at a fast speed. Quick as lightning Rags throws down the little girl out of the way of the bicyclist while he himself in run down and rendered unconscious. An ambulance is called for and Rags is brought to the hospital while the bicyclist is arrested. The little girl follows Rags to the hospital and thanks him for saving her life. The father investigating the life of the youth decides to take care of him. He pays the couple who had granted shelter to Rags for their trouble and now a new life begins for Rags.

Ten Years Later. Rags' Benefactor, His Son a Black Sheep. Elsie, the little girl has grown up to a young lady. Her brother, Tom, is a good-for-nothing. He had gambled and lost and needs money. He asks mother, but having spent all her savings she is unable to give him more. Just then Mr. Walker, the father, enters. After much persuasion from his wife and daughter he hands his son some money, "for the last time," as he says. Tom immediately leaves for the club room where soon the money is lost at the card table.

Rags Is Confidential Clerk to His Benefactor. Rags is working at his desk. Mr. Walker enters. He apparently is very fond of Rags. Elsie calls for her father and incidentally shows her love for Rags. After both have gone, Tom enters, apparently under the influence of liquor. He wants to ask his father for money. Rags not wishing his benefactor to see his son in this condition gives Tom some money of his own and pushes him out of the door.

An Unexpected Meeting. It is night time. Tom, knowing that a large sum had been received by his father after banking hours and that this money is lying in the safe, puts on a mask and breaks into his father's office. Incidentally, Rags passes the building and is very much surprised to see light in the office and a man's shadow upon the shade. He slowly enters the building and 'phones to the police to send an officer. He then enters the office, procures a revolver, turns on the light and holds up the surprised robber. A quick move and he tears the mask from the robber's face.



PREVENTS TIRED EYES AND HEADACHES
The rapidity of our new shutter has been so perfected that 30 to 40 per cent. less non-exposure (which has heretofore caused the tremulous vibration producing so many tired eyes and headaches) is found in the Motiograph than in any other machine, making perfect brilliancy of picture and sharpness of outline. Together with the rocklike steadiness of the pedestal the flicker is thus entirely eliminated.
Five-cent Theatre and Vaudeville-House Managers increase their bank account with the Motiograph. Patrons who come once will always come again where they know they see the best pictures, positively rest their eyes instead of tiring them, and where all fire risks are removed.

The Motiograph 1909 Theatre Model, Especially Approved by the Underwriters Association

OTHER POINTS OF EXCELLENCE IN THE MOTIOGRAPH found in no other machines are: A special Film Rewind by which the film can be rewound with the main crank in two minutes without removing either reels or magazines, saving time between pictures and entertainments; perfected Fireproof Magazines, Fire Traps, with four rollers and with spring actuated flanged guides, preventing side movement and making it impossible for fire to pass them; never failing Automatic Fireproof Shutters; Perfect Framing Device; Flanged Sprocket Rollers to prevent film being torn or ruined by accidentally running off sprocket wheels; Enclosed Gears and working parts; Perfect Take-up with new form of belt adjuster; Lid Off Wide Open Lamp House making it easily accessible; Improved Arc Lamp with all Hand Wheel Adjustments; Slide Carrier Swing, saving one-third more illustration for the Motion Pictures.

Rags Lies to Save the Good Name of His Benefactor. The surprise was so great that Rags dropped the revolver. He quickly picks it up and tells Tom to exchange places with him. He then forces him to 'phone to his father to come at once or else the police would be there and Tom would be arrested as a thief. Tom does as told. Rags puts on the mask and holds up his hands while Tom stands before him pointing the revolver at him. Mr. Walker enters, goes over to the supposed robber and tears off his mask. Seeing Rags he drops in his chair heart broken. Rags begs forgiveness, but the old man thinking of all he did for the boy cannot forgive him. Just then the police officer enters, but is told to go and that all was a mistake. The officer understands and exits.

"I Don't Believe It." Tom and his father return home. Mr. Walker relates his experience, but Elsie refuses to believe it. "Ask Tom," says the father. But Tom remains silent. Elsie takes her hat and coat to go to Rags and find out for herself. We next see her in Rags' room where she vainly begs him to deny the accusation of her father. Broken-hearted, she leaves.

A Confession, a Resolution and All Is Forgiven. Father, mother and son are still talking of the supposed robbery when Elsie returns. The strain has been too much for her and she gives way to heart-rendering sorrow. Tom cannot stand this any longer. He confesses all and begs his father's forgiveness. Mr. Walker quickly goes to Rags and thanking him for what he did to save his good name he brings him home into the arms of Elsie. Everything is forgiven and judging by the earnestness of Tom's sorrow, it may be expected that he will begin a better and more useful life. Length, 950 feet.

THE RIGHT TO LABOR.—John is a hard working fellow and a good provider for wife and family.

The Factory. Bill is kissing his wife and children good-bye and leaves for the factory where he is employed. Here some excellent views are introduced of a steel making plant with John at his work.

Agitator. It is lunch time. The workingmen sit or stand around, many listening to the speech of an agitator who tries to persuade the workingmen to ask for higher wages. Returned to their work the unruly spirit of some of the workingmen begins to work and soon a resolution is passed demanding higher wages. John is approached to sign the resolution, but he refuses to do so.

A Demand for Higher Wages. A delegation of workmen waits on the general manager. He promises consideration of their demand. After a while he sends the following note to the leader: "On account of the general depression in business, we regret not to be able to grant your demand for higher wages. If business improves we will be glad to consider your request. S. Holmes, General Manager."

Declaring a Strike. The workingmen decide to strike. They lay down their work one after another. They ask John to join them, but he absolutely refuses to do so. "I have a wife and children to care for and I shall stick to my work." All leave. When the general manager comes to the factory he asks John about the whereabouts of the men and shakes John's hand heartily when he is informed that all went out on a strike except him and a few others.

"This Is a Free Country. You Have the Right to Strike. I Have the Right to Labor." Pickets of strikers guard the factory to prevent men from going to work. John, however, is not to be detained and goes to his work as usual, saying: "This is a free country. You have the right to strike. I have the right to labor."

An Eventful Night. It is night time. Some strike sympathizers decide to get even with John and try to blow up his house. Their intention, however, is frustrated and on bended knees John and his wife thank God for their escape from here.

Three Months Later. Back to Work. John is now superintendent of the works. All the men have returned to work. A boy enters the superintendent's office and hands John the following note: "Owing to your diligent work and that of your fellow-workers, we are pleased to announce that we have decided to advance all wages 10 per cent. You may convey all [illegible] to the men. Thanking you for being [illegible] we remain, yours truly, S. Holmes, General Manager."

[illegible] Length, 850 feet.

PATHE FRERES.

THE BEGGAR'S COIN. [illegible] coin into his hat and the kind-hearted couple pass on.

In the meantime the aforesaid gambler joins his friends at the table and engages in a game of chance, where his luck seems to be against him, and he is a heavy loser. Before he realizes it, he is penniless, and disheartened he leaves the place. Whil walking down the street he notices the old beggar, and thinking him asleep the despicable coward avails himself of the opportunity and takes the coin out of the hat. He starts back to the gambling den to try and win back his money, and this time is more fortunate, for it is not long before he breaks the bank, after which he leaves his companions in a very happy frame of mind.

He goes then to return the stolen coin, but as he approaches the spot he is amazed to see a large crowd, and upon investigating discovers the lifeless form of the poor old beggar, whom he treated so shamefully.

Becoming conscience-stricken, the gambler hurries home and his ill-gotten money is of little use to him in bringing the required peace of mind. He is so overwrought with remorse that he continually sees the spectre of the old beggar coming to him with outstretched hand, asking alms. So great is his terror that he rushes over to the grate and burns the money, after which he topples over on the floor dead. Length, 548 feet.

FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH. An old monk strolling through the wildwood meets a friendly young man and in the course of their conversation the monk tells his newly made friend of a fountain near the Monastery, the waters of which possess the wonderful properties which will turn the aged into the bloom of youth. Becoming interested, the young man goes with the old monk to the fountain, and after securing a bottle of the marvelous water, he starts on his way. As he is walking along he meets a very old woman and availing himself of the opportunity to try the effects of the water, he induces her to take a drink, and immediately she is transformed into a beautiful young woman.

Going then to a remote part of the wood he falls asleep, and two men come along and steal the bottle, after which, thinking that it contains ordinary water, they each take a drink and immediately they are changed into little boys. The rightful owner soon comes upon and scene and after chastising the urchins for their conduct, he goes his way.

Passing a place where an old peasant is milking a cow, the youth asks for a glass of the milk, and upon being refused, takes revenge by forcing some of the water down the animal's throat and suddenly it is transformed into a little calf. Length, 354 feet.

PERE MILON. This interesting picture is taken from the book, written by M. Guy de Maupassant, revealing an incident which happened during the Franco-Prussian war. The Prussians are shown in the first picture taking old Milon's farmhouse, and after killing his old father and son, they subject the old Frenchman to all sorts of indignities. The old peasant keeps hidden under the appearance of the most abject submission, a feeling of hatred against the invaders and vows vengeance for the iniquities which he is made to bear. In his night wanderings he kills every stray soldier he meets, and so clever does he carry out his plan of vengeance and cover his tracks, that although coming in close contact with his victims during the day, he manages to mislead them. One soldier he attacks with a scythe and after donning his uniform, he throws his victim into the river, after which he lies on the road, and two more soldiers, thinking he is one of their companions in distress, come along to offer him aid. As they dismount he attacks them, and before they have time to defend themselves he leaves them dead on the road.

One night he attacks two soldiers, but is successful in killing only one and wounding the other, who in turn shoots him in the arm, but he manages to make good his escape. Arriving at his house he is recognized by his adversary, and immediately is condemned to death. He does not flinch, but stands with arms folded to await the volley which is to end his life, for he feels satisfied that he has evened up matters. On the shutters of his cabin he marked the number of soldiers whom he killed, and when added up it amounts to sixteen, one for the death of his father and eight to avenge his son. Then he dies happy, having accomplished his purpose. Length, 1,000 feet.

THE INDIAN TRAILER.—The first scene opens on the property of a well-known Western ranchman. A bunch of cow punchers are assembled wasting their time and their employer's money by playing cards. The ranchman catches them at the game, quickly breaks it up, and sends them to work. One cow puncher, a greaser, who dislikes being ordered about, even by his employer, tells the ranchman so. A fight ensues in which the ranchman gets the better of the greaser, and kicks him off the place. After this, the greaser swears revenge. He hits upon a plan, and with the assistance of another greaser they secure the ranchman's little girl, taking with them a shepherd dog, a playmate of the little girl, the dog being utilized later on by the greasers, as the story will show. Eventually the two greasers, the little girl and the dog arrive at the greasers' hut, and a note is written to the little girl's father, stating that she has been taken out of revenge for the treatment the greaser received at the hands of the ranchman and that they will not return her until they feel inclined to do so. The note is tied to the dog, the greaser well knowing that once the dog is released he will make his way back home and that the note will eventually fall into the hands of the little girl's father. The dog is turned loose and hurriedly makes his way home. Immediately upon the finding of the note by the rancher he gathers about him his cow punchers and they start on the trail of the greasers. In order to make sure of locating the girl, the father secures an Indian, who is noted for his ability as a "trailer." The Indian is not long in finding the tracks of the fugitives, and he eventually leads the father to the house where his child and its captors are in hiding. A thrilling chase now ensues, and after many startling occurrences the child is returned to its father and the greaser meets a just punishment at the hands of the Indian trailer.

HUNTING BIG GAME IN AFRICA.—A lion run is discovered, and, unmindful of promises which must be fulfilled, they prepare to secure a fine specimen. This is accomplished by building a trap, a large hole dug in the soft earth and carefully covered with canebrake and jungle grass. This being arranged, a toothsome goat is bound upon a jutting rock directly in the monarch's path in such manner that the hidden trap must be crossed before the bait can be reached. The party then conceal themselves and await results. The lion soon winds his prey, and unwittingly walks into the pitfall. The bearers rush forward a cage, brought along for that purpose, and a magnificent jungle monarch is soon started on his long journey to America.

But our party came to Africa to hunt, and our mighty leader has promised himself that he will add to his list of big game brought down by my rifle, "at least one King of Beasts." Menelik Dodo, a noted tracker of big game, leads our hunter to a spot where his desire can be fulfilled. We first see Menelik on the king's track. Our hunter conceals himself in a thicket to the windward side of a spring, where Menelik declares the forest lord is wont to drink. This proves to be correct, as a handsome male specimen soon trots leisurely into view. There is a sharp report and the startled animal springs in the air, whirls out of sight for a moment, then charges direct at our hunter. The repeating rifle cracks again, and the king is down with an ounce of lead in his brain, and the wish of years has been gratified, he has shot his first lion. The bearers arrive and swing the trophy on a pole and carry it triumphantly to camp. An expert taxidermist is called in and this once lordly beast who has roamed the African jungles as a monarch, soon yields all that is lasting of his majestic beauty, to adorn the floor of a Long Island den. Our hunters prepare to rest after their strenuous labors and all retire, dee-lighted with their first day in the jungles.

NEPTUNE'S DAUGHTER, OR THE SHOEMAKER'S DREAM.—Jim is a young lad who is very fond of playing tricks on his master and mistress, but as often as he plays his tricks he also receives his well-earned punishment.

To-day he has been especially well disposed for making foolery and he does not escape his punishment. He is even deprived of his dinner, and has to remain at the workshop while the others have their dinner. Jim sits down very much discouraged, and soon after he falls off to sleep.

He dreams that he is on board a large vessel going far away. The vessel is attacked by pirates, and the captain tells Jim to go down in the powder room and blow up the vessel as soon as a Malaj is coming on board. Jim blows up the ship and all the men perish. Jim goes down to the bottom of the sea and finds himself resting at the bottom of the merking's throne. The daughter of the merking awakes him to life, and incurs the wrath of all the court by declaring her love to the young sailor, offering him her hand. As Jim moreover refuses the offer, it looks as if the mermen are going to fall upon him and kill him. But the princess waves them all away and a magnificent palace arises at the background. The princess leads the astonished Jim in there, showing him all the riches of the sea and the throne which is trimmed with jewels and says to him, "This I will all give you if you will only be mine." But Jim says, "No." And now the little princess gets angry. She summons two mermen and tells them to imprison Jim, but as no prison is on hand they have to take him to the treasury.

As Jim has recovered a little from his fright he makes haste to fill his pockets with jewels, and as, at the same time, an anchor comes down, he takes hold of it and is dragged up through the water.

Jim's last vision is the best. He finds himself at a large hall luxuriously furnished, and he divides generously his riches with his old master and mistress. But here the dream comes to an abrupt end, the master taking hold of him and giving him a good beating.

THE INTRUDER.—We open this picture in a quaint home of a young wood-cutter playing with his little daughter while his wife is busily engaged with her household duties when a knock is heard at the door and the father admits a stranger who asks for something to eat, which is cheerfully given him. While the good wife is preparing his food the stranger becomes fascinated with her beauty and so far forgets the hospitality extended him by his host, continues to cast loving glances at the wife and finally, while she is engaged in pouring out his coffee takes the liberty to grasp her hand, whereupon the wife resents his familiarity and pushes him from her, causing him to collide with her husband, who is so engrossed with his daughter that he has not noticed what has been going on behind his back. The stranger, to protect himself, apologizes for the seeming blunder on his part, begs leave to go, thanking all for the courtesy extended him, and while making his departure, continues his bold glances toward the now indignant and frightened wife. The husband, unconscious of what has been going on prepares to go to his daily toil, so kissing his devoted wife and child a fond good-bye takes his ax and leaves for the chopping grounds. Having closely watched the departure of the husband the intruder re-enters the house unannounced and presses his undesired attentions upon the now thoroughly astonished wife. Knowing she is unprotected he becomes bolder and attempts to embrace her, the wife eludes him and taking a revolver from the mantle piece demands him to leave. The ingrate snatches the frightened child from the chair and shields himself and dares her to fire, fearing she might harm the child she is forced to unload the revolver and replace it on the mantle. The intruder, now realizing that he is master of the situation, roughly embraces her and during the struggle that ensues she frantically strikes him in the face causing him to momentarily relax. This gives her a moment to grasp the lamp from the table and hurl it at the now enraged suitor. It strikes him on the arm and rebounds to the fire place, explodes, and ignites the house in flames. Like a fiend he rushes at the wife, who desperately tries to protect herself, he forcing her against the table causing it to overturn, she falling unconscious across it. Perceiving the room in flames the intruder makes his escape, locking the prostrate woman and child inside to perish in the flames. The husband, not knowing what is happening at home, reaches the chopping ground and commences his daily work. Glancing toward his home he sees it in flames and madly rushes to assist his loved ones, whom he fears are in danger. The wife now regaining consciousness rushes to the door in an effort to escape, but finds it locked, to her horror. The husband is seen nearing his home where the wife and child are madly trying to batter down the secured door. The husband finally arrives and bursts open the door and rescues his beloved wife and child. The intruder returns to his abode, but raw remorse gnaws at his heart until he is forced to return to the scene of his crime, and to his utter amazement learns that his supposed victims are safe. Falling upon his knees before the wood-cutter he begs forgiveness, but is refused by the husband, who is about to strike him when the wife intervenes and pleads with her husband to allow him to go and profit by his intrusion. Length, 730 feet.

JOHNNY AND THE INDIANS.—Johnny Jones, a typical novel-reading lad, tries to beat his way into the tent of Texas Bill's Wild West Show. Our first scene shows the show tent, with Indians, cowboys and Western girl. Johnny is caught and fired out. He knocks over Big Chief, who is about to kill him, when Arizona Nell takes a hand and saves Johnny from the mad Indian. The Chief contents himself with kicking Johnny out of sight. Johnny gets even by bending his baseball bat over the Chief's rear end. The Chief draws a huge knife and goes after Johnny's scalp.

Johnny reaches home late and his old maid aunt sends him supperless to bed. But hunger and a

The Reason Why

You may wonder why we talk so much about our New Independent Films, also about Our Exclusive Film Service.

We are persistent in our arguments about our goods, just as much for the purpose of stimulating a higher standard of films—films of quality—as we are for the purpose of increasing the sale of Our New Independent goods. While we are always on the lookout for more business, we realize that exhibitors are greatly in need of films of quality—Brand New Independent Goods, such as we are offering—and the best way to create a demand for films of this class is to keep convincing you that it means more dollars to you to show only that kind.

When you exhibitors begin to insist upon showing films of merit only, and will deal with those exchanges only that can furnish them, and at the same time give you an exclusive service; when you decide that your exchange must give you positive assurance on these points, then shoddy films and the kind of service some exchanges have been furnishing will become a thing of the past.

WE IMPORT OUR OWN FILMS

and while we do not depend solely upon importing concerns we get the best they have. This is the reason we can furnish High Grade Individual Service consisting of the latest New Independent Films and the biggest money makers. That we can furnish you with such service is proof that we are already doing our part for the good of every exhibitor. Let us send you the synopsis of our latest.

desire to finish the thrilling story. "The Boy Scout," impel Johnny to come back to the dining room to enjoy some cake and his novel. A noise startles him. He goes to the window and sees the four Indians. Seizing a revolver, Johnny lies in wait. The Indians enter. Johnny shoots the Chief, and the other Indians seize him. Aunt enters while the Indians are eating and drinking. She is seized and the Indians grab her hair to scalp her. But her wig comes off at the first pull, and the Indians, after a tussle, kill her. Johnny, who has crawled out during the scrimmage, sees all this through the window. He runs off, followed by the Indians. Now follow exciting scenes. Arizona Nell finds Johnny in the woods almost exhausted. She gives him a knife, and they run off as the Indians approach. Nell is captured and tied to a tree. Johnny comes up, and after a terrific fight with Lone Wolf kills him and releases Nell. Johnny is captured. The Indians hang him by the feet from a tree and build a fire under him. Left alone, Johnny struggles, raises himself up and bites through the rope, just as the flames are reaching him. With a shriek of terror he falls into the fire. And then———

Johnny wakes up. He has been asleep and has fallen from the chair.

His face is one eager, happy grin at finding that it was all a dream.

But his smile vanishes when auntie comes in and gives him a good spanking.

The acting of this story has never been excelled. There is something doing in every foot of the reel. Big melodramatic scenes are brightened up by roaring comedy situations. The antics of the funny Indian would make a horse laugh. Length, 900 feet.

FISHING INDUSTRIES (Film Import Co.).—This film starts by showing fishermen throwing into the ocean large nets in which to catch fish. We next see them drawing in the nets, from which are taken tons of fish. The next scene demonstrates the sorting of the fish, and subsequently they are placed in refrigerators. All this is done on board the ship, as our next scene shows the arrival of the ship in port. The tons of fish are then removed into a storehouse, cleaned, packed into boxes.

ROSIN INDUSTRY is an educational subject by the Itala Company. This film is very interesting—showing the rosin taken from the trees, its passage through the factory, and then to the consumer.

THE SEASIDE GIRL.—At the beginning of this film we observe a pretty girl reading a book on the beach. She is interrupted by two men, who apparently ask if they could not sit beside her and read. They are rejected. She also attracts the attention of others, who apparently ask her the same question. They are also rejected. She decides to leave and does so, the three men following. They tackle her again, and they are again rejected. The three men now scrap together, and while they are doing so the girl escapes. They notice this and decide to follow her. We next see her going into a bath house, and, subsequently, swimming. The men quickly hire row boats, and keep on her track. With the exception of one the other men seem to be afraid of the water, but one jumps into the water, carries her to the bath house, waits outside until she is dressed, and they go off to get married.

DUMB SAGACITY.—Depicts very vividly the discernment of a dog, which posssesses, no doubt, much more sense than some of the human beings now have. A young girl, about 15, is taken by her parents to their friends in the country. The little girl is notified by them that there is a beach a short distance from the house, and she asks leave of her parents to go, who gladly comply with her request. We next see her on her way, and also a dog that she takes. She paddles in the water a while, and decides to sit upon a large rock, which is some distance from the shore. The tide rises until the water is only a few feet from the surface of the rock. She makes several attempts to get off, but seeing that the water is too deep, and she cannot swim, she gesticulates her intention to her dog, which apparently understands her. We next see the dog swimming to shore, and after reaching it, runs home to notify her parents or friends, only to find that they have all gone out. The dog runs into a stable in the hope of finding them there; only to find a horse. Now comes a wonderful specimen of canine sagacity. The dog loosens the rope by which the horse is tied, chases her outside, runs ahead of her, the horse following, in the direction of the young girl. When they reach the shore the horse swims out to the girl, who gets upon his back, and she is safely brought home. The film ends by showing the girl patting and kissing the animals.

A NEW POLICEMAN.—This film starts by showing us two pretty girls talking to a dilapidated looking creature, who is apparently asking them where the nearest police station is. As the girls are instructing him an officer appears, and he is officially instructed. We next see him inside of the police station telling the captain his wants. He is examined, and is found to be in a physically and mentally good condition. We next see him emerging from the station in his new sartorial habiliment, and on duty, in which he creates a series of very amusing episodes.

DRAMA IN THE FOREST.—This film tells a story of a pretty girl who is infatuated with two young men. The story is very nicely told and will be sure to take well wherever it is shown.

AN AWFUL TOOTHACHE (Cines).—This film commences by showing us a man running to a dentist to have a decayed tooth removed. Our next scene shows him sitting in the dentist's chair and the doctor having great trouble in trying to remove the tooth. The doctor cannot do anything to it, so he runs away. Outside he stops a driver and asks him to pull the tooth out for him. The driver consents. He ties a rope to the back of his wagon and to the bad tooth. But the tooth is so strong that it cannot be removed. We next see him tied to a tree and a rope put onto the tooth again and tied to a cow's tail. Again the tooth cannot be removed, as it pulls the tail off the cow. He apparently gives up, and we see him on his way home. Accidentally he runs into a little girl, who is knocked down by the impact, and who, subsequently, gets up and slaps him on the cheek, thereby knocking out his tooth; consequently he proceeds homeward with a "Steeplechase" smile over his countenance.

One Reel a Week—REGULAR RELEASE DAY, FRIDAY

Don't judge us by others or the company we are in. Remember we are by no means amateurs in the business, having secured the best talent to pose for our pictures. Photography of quality, scenery unexcelled, using modern facilities which enable us to produce pictures of durability, steadiness and high class workmanship. All our film is tinted and toned throughout.

First Release, Friday, May 21st—DISINHERITED SON'S LOYALTY

DISINHERITED SON'S LOYALTY.—Jack and Tom the two sons of a retired merchant. Tom induces the old man to disown Jack through false statement of his character, thereby securing the signature of his father to paper, turning over his entire wealth and property to him. His father now has nothing and lives with him, and when Tom is married the poor old dad is always in the way, and is turned out by Tom, and is about to be sent to the Poor House, when through a messenger his son Jack is informed of the action, and is in time to save his father, whom he finds praying at his wife's grave. Jack who has prospered after 5 years, and is now the owner of a saw mill, takes the old man in an automobile to his own home, where he is cared for and loved during his remaining years. Approximate length, 850 feet.

Second Release, Friday May 28th—ROMANCE OF A FISHERMAID

Jenning, a pretended friend and wealthy City chap is also in love with Grace, lures her to a lonely hut, attacks her, and to save her honor she fights Jennings and escapes through a window, breaking the glass with a chair. Jennings swears vegeance on both she and Weed. He meets Weed, draws Weed's own knife and tries to kill him, and places the knife in the possession of another. Later is shown where Jennings is taken into the custody of the police and proven the guilty party. Weed then wins the girl.

This picture shows scenery of the arrival of a merry fishing party on a sail boat anchoring at the landing, and entering Captain Miles' house.

We might add that this is one of the best pictures of its kind ever shown. Approximate length, 800 feet.

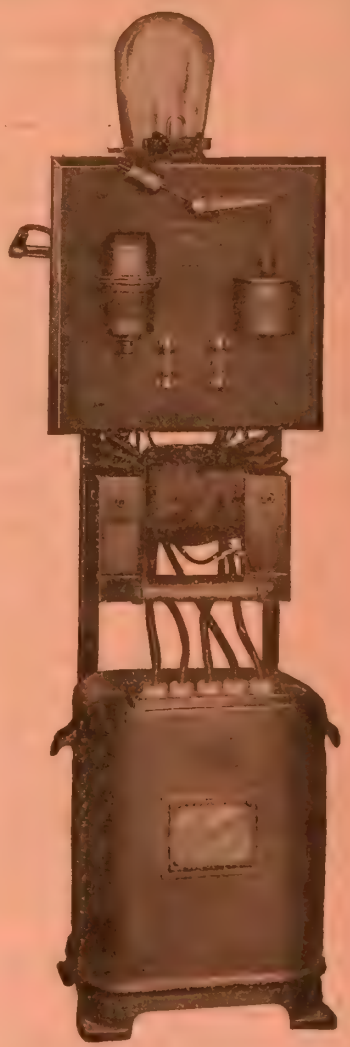
You can if you buy a GENERAL ELECTRIC MERCURY ARC RECTIFIER for your Moving Picture Theatre instead of rheostats or choke coils.

The Rectifier will take alternating current from the supply circuit and change it to direct current at just the right voltage for the arc. With the Rectifier you do not have any trouble with red-hot rheostats, your incandescent lights do not flicker when you start your arc, and you are not troubled with spots and "ghosts" on the screen. The entire outfit operates smoothly, safely and satisfactorily. Your patrons will be better satisfied because the pictures are better. You will be better satisfied because you are actually saving money.



Assume that you operate your lamp 6 hours per day, and that you pay 10c per kw. hour. A glance at the following operating costs will show just exactly how much you can save in one year:

Direct Current and Rheostat, 26 amps. on the arc . $515.00

"NEXT!"

Two hundred and forty thousand dollars out of every million collected by the film trust from exhibitors, goes to the licensed film manufacturers! Let that fact rattle around in your topknot, Mr. Exhibitor. Don't you see what it means? It means that the film trust and the manufacturers who are in with it are trying to milk you just the same as they have milked the licensed renters. They issued rules that the licensed renters must buy $2,500 worth of licensed films every month for each office owned by each renter. Not only that but the renter must take whatever the trust produced, good, indifferent or rotten. In this way many a renter was milked dry. So now the trust turns to that nice, juicy, fat cow known as "Exhibitor." A little figuring showed that $2.00 a week collected from each exhibitor in America would yield a rake-off of about a million dollars a year! Fine and fancy! But listen! Some of the big exhibitors who have theatres that take in gross receipts of $100,000 per year, dont have to pay a cent more for their license than does the smaller exhibitor whose business is not one-tenth [or even one-twentieth of $100,000. And that's not all. Hundreds of exhibitors are refusing to pay a cent of license money. Yet they still get all the films they want. Therefore, if you're paying real money for a license that isn't worth the paper it is printed on, can't you see why you are a full cousin to that gentleman known as Mr. E. Z. Mark? Don't be milked! Get your dander up. Turn independent. Advertise your independence to the people of your town and they'll back you up just the way the independents all over the west are backing me up.

The Cricket on the Hearth

Beautiful Adaptation of Dickens' Famous Story

Most popular among Dickens' works is "The Cricket on the Hearth," a st ry founded on that dear old superstition that the chirping of the cricket was ominous of good luck and woe to the household when it is hushed. The Biograph Company appreciating the sentiment of this work, has taken special care in making this production evince the true atmospheric tenderness intended by the author.

The series concludes with a grand view of a silvery sea illuminated by moonlight. Appropriate tints throughout.

"THE ACCUSING DOUBLE"

RELEASE, SATURDAY, MAY 29, 1909.

Drama. Approximate Length, 891 Feet.

At a gaming table at Monte Carlo, a young man loses his fortune, which is won by an American gentleman. Disconcerted, the young man saunters in front of the casino deploring his ill-luck, when he meets the American strolling along towards the seacoast.

A cheerful conversation is under way when an idea occurs to the young man to regain his losses, and he promptly proceeds to execute it. When he observes that the coast is clear he draws his pistol and with it kills his companion, whereupon he robs him, and then takes the body in a boat out on the high seas, where he throws it overboard.

The disappearance of the American is apparent and a search instituted. A renowned detective put upon the case is soon at work in unraveling the mystery. Disguised as the American the detective makes his appearance in public. He is prompt to note the effect this has upon all he meets and before long he is on the trail of the guilty man.

He interrupts an impending engagement and succeeds in securing a confession of guilt.

This subject teems with interest and excitement and will also be appreciated for the photographic quality and detail.

"HOW JONES PAID HIS DEBTS"

RELEASE, WEDNESDAY, MAY 26, 1909.

Comedy. Approximate Length, 604 Feet.

With any number of bills to pay and no money for the purpose and no prospects of securing any, Mr. Jones is in sore straits. One collector after another calls and failing to secure the amount due him reclaims the goods sold to Jones. As a result he loses his suit of clothes, hat, shoes, etc., and is obliged to don an evening suit at midday.

After several escapades which enable him to secure an overcoat and a meal for himself and pet dog, he strikes upon a novel idea of clearing his indebtedness at one stroke. He disguises himself and then posts a death notice at the entrance to his home. Collectors calling to make their claims seeing the notice of Jones' death close their accounts. Jones watches the performance in his disguise, chuckles cheerfully at his cleverness and starts life over again with a clean slate.

"PANTHER HUNTING ON THE ISLE OF JAVA"

RELEASE, WEDNESDAY, MAY 26, 1909.

Sporting. Approximate Length, 357 Feet.

This film gives a perfect idea of the difficulties encountered in a hunt for one of the most subtle and ferocious beasts of prey making its haunts in the jungles, the panther.

The dense forest with its masses of undergrowth is clearly shown; the hunters winding their way along the trail in search of game. They endeavor to beat the animal from his lair and then set their traps to capture him.

Our photographers were fortunate in being present at one of the finest catches of the season and give all details. The entire series is intensely interesting and exciting.

Moving Pictures in Stereoscopic Relief.

As the subject of moving pictures in stereoscopic relief is again attracting attention it may be desirable to point out some of the fundamental difficulties which have to be overcome before the problem is solved. Long ever before moving pictures became commercially practicable the subject engaged the attention of experimentalists and the path of invention is strewn with futile efforts to reduce theory to practice.

We will not go so far as to assert that a moving picture cannot be presented to the eye in a stereoscopic relief, but we do say that it is an exceedingly difficult piece of work to carry out. The only successful stereoscopic pictures in relief that have been shown were produced by John Anderton, of Birmingham, England, some sixteen years ago. These were stationary photographs. The two halves of a stereoscopic transparency were projected on the screen nearly overlapping line for line. In other words, the total effect when viewed with the unaided eye was that of duplication of treatment. Now the spectator in a hall viewed this picture through an eye piece or holder, in the left ocular or eye piece of which was a prism set at a certain angle, whilst in the right eye piece was set another prism mounted at a different angle. This is a rough and ready description of the viewing apparatus. When the picture on the screen was viewed through this eye piece the resulting effect was that there was presented to the left eye the left picture on the screen, and to the right eye the right picture on the screen, and so the brain, in conformity with the laws of binocular vision, received two dissimilar views of the same subject, and therefore the effect produced was that of relief, roundness, depth, distance; in other words, the illusion of reality.

Every student of stereoscopic photography knows that these are the necessary conditions of stereoscopic picture making. Mr. Anderton's results were strikingly good, but they had one obvious drawback; namely, great loss of light.
